Motherhood Not a Bar to Teaching

The attempt to exclude mother teachers from the public schools of NewYork has resulted in failure. It is announced that all of the fifteen or more teachers who were removed because they were married and became mothers have been reinstated. In this matter the Board of Education has been overruled by the courts, and the important question at issue has been definitely decided. Almost, if not quite, from the first, public sentiment in New York city has sustained the mother teachers. It has not yet been made plain whether the reinstated teachers will be paid for their forced absence since dismissal, but logically their cases parallel those of members of the police force who were dismissed and later restored to duty by the courts, with back pay.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

Colonel Seldom Consistent

Among other things in his Plattsburg speech Theodore Roosevelt denounced the hyphenated American, the poltroon, the college sissy, and elocution as a substitute for action. He also supplemented his attack with a statement in which he said: "While I believe that once war is on, every citizen should stand by the land, yet in any crisis which may or may not lead up to war, the prime duty of the citizen is, by criticism and advice, to insist that the nation takethe right course of action." To judge from his attacks on those who believe in the other extreme, as Mr. Bryan, Mr. Roosevelt denies to them this prime duty of urging the government "by criticism and advice" to adopt the right course of action. Always a boisterous and blustering advocate of the "Square Deal" Mr. Roosevelt would bully all who adopt a different course from that headvocates. Everlastingly denouncing the brutality of the assumption of power by the strong over the weak he forgets his own imperial conduct toward the weak stateo f Columbia when he was president and attacks the self restraint, patience, and generosity of the United States today under President Wilson. — Auburn Citizen.

A Happy Ending Indicated

Everything points to an absolutely amicable settlement of the difficulties between the United States and Germany. More than that, once an understanding has been arrived at between the two governments, they will know each other better, have a clearer comprehension of each other's aims and intentions, and will in future be on better terms than has been the case since the beginning of the war.

Germany now knows that the United States does not want war, but that it would not shrink from its duty even though the price be precious blood.

The United States now knows that Germany is sincerely anxious to retain our good will and that she is willing to bring the sacrifice of limiting her submarine warfare to be able to lay claim to our friendship.

In the minds of both nations, these convictions will now become firmly imbedded. Thus fortified, both we perhaps soon realize that the attempt to sow discord between them emanates not from one or the other, but from outside and deeply interested agencies.—Brooklyn Times.

Higher Education in United States

Marked increase in the number of students in higher institutions of learning, and a slight decrease in the number of such schools, is one of the features of statistics of education in the United States.

There were enrolled last year in universities, colleges and technical foundations throughout the country 216,493 men and women, an increase over the year 1913 of 14,262. The number of institutions was 567 which was 29 less than the number in the list for 1913. States or municipalities control 93 of them; private corporations 474.

Male students numbered 139,373 and female students 77,120, showing an increase of nearly 10,000 men and 3,500 women over 1913.

Receipts for the year totaled $120,579,257 of which $18,422,856 was for endowment. Benefactions for colleges and universities amounted to $26,670,017 or about two million more than in the previous 12 months.

Six institutions received in excess of a million dollars each from men and women of means who wished to further the cause of education by such donations and 45 universities, colleges and technical schools reported gifts amounting to more than $100,000 each.

In the past seven years the largest increase of income has resulted through State, and municipal appropriations and the smallest from tuition and other fees.

State and municipal appropriations grew from $9,649,549 in 1908 to $23,400,540 in 1914, while fees for tuition and other educational service increased from $15,390,847 to $22,504,529.

If similar results are shown by the statistics of this year, it will indicate that while there is no diminution, but on the contrary, an intensifying, of the disposition of students to avail themselves of the higher education, there is a tendency of some small and struggling schools, toward elimination.

That is one phase of the stress of competition, but it is a pity to see any deserving college close its doors.

Some of the finest educational work has been done by schools which have had a hard struggle for existence.—Buffalo Times.

Mr. Wanamaker and the Indian

Mr. Rodman Wanamaker's assertion that the contemplated Indian Memorial in New York Harbor "would not fulfill it purpose unless it ushered in the day of full, free citizenship for the red man" gives a deeper significance to the projected statute than many persons supposed. Mr. Wanamaker quotes President Wilson, who in turn quoted President Jefferson, both wishing for the day "when the red man becomes truly one people with us, enjoying all the rights and privileges we do and living in peace and plenty."

More than one hundred years lie between these expressions of the same wish by two of the nation's Presidents yet the political status of the Indian has not changed. The Herald has turned the light on many of the wrongs against the Indian. Mr. Wanamaker is going ahead bravely with his work of enlightenment and uplift, of which the educational exhibit that won the Grand Prize at the Panama-Pacific Exposition is a part. He loses no opportunity to impress upon the American people the duty of the nation to its wards. As he has explained, he wants the memorial to be emblematic of something more than a "cigar store" Indian and believes its erection should synchronize with full citizenship, adding:—"If we wait another hundred years to emancipate the red man there will be none to emancipate."—N. Y. Herald.

GET RID OF SINGING BIRDS

When the friends of a poor, decrepit old man told him that he ought to buy food for himself instead of for the three dozen canary birds which sang in every nook of the little hovel where he lived, the bird-owner stubbornly refused to act on such good advice. The old man was forced to admit that frequently he did not know from whence would come his next meal. Each day the morrow held greater privations for him than those of today. Still he would not part with a single singing bird.

Was not the old man of all men the most unwise?

And yet his need was not greater than that of a people whose welfare is subordinated to the obstinacy of one or two men, who say to you, You do not know what you want; what is good for you or for your city. You say (more than forty out of fifty-two of you), that a street is wide enough—that it shall not be made wider, and we as guardians of your interests and your taxes say to you, We comprise the whole show.

And yet the same coterie tell us that in a Commission-Manager form of Government there may grow up a horrible monarchy whose members would never listen to the singing of the little birdies.

Are these men of all men real wise—the men who have wanted their way in foisting upon the persons most concerned something which they do not want—the widening of a city street?

What a multitude of people there are who will not be content with something that they know is for their own good. They turn from the counsel of the people who have lived and seen, and follow in their own impractical, unsatisfying course. They tell us there is one way to have good government and that is through dividing the electorate by geographical lines. This means the election of aldermen for each ward, which means maintaining a legislative system instead of an executive machine.

What is the business of conducting a city more than an executive business. Commission-Manager form of government is the embodiment of an executive business arrangement. What is there to fear in such an arrangement? Surely nothing, when it is remembered that the building of the Panama canal was conducted by the President of the United States and a handful of cabinet members.

Why cannot a city the size of Fulton be governed upon a similar plan?

Have not the people seen enough to make them want to part with the singing birds?

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condititon of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

More "Failures at 40" Than Ever Before

By G. O. REED, Terre Haute, Ind.

What chance of success has a man after he reaches the age of forty?

In the last few months any observant person who has come in contact with the "down-and-outs" has seen more "failures at forty" than ever before. I refer particularly to the men who have been out of employment for months and who were never idle before for more than a week or two in each year.

Those who haven't found it necessary to hunt up another job in order to exist will never know the heartaches resulting from such an experience. It is a hateful predicament to be in even when industrial conditions are at their best.

I have met many men of middle age in the last few months who were out of work through no fault of their own, and who would have been glad to accept even a menial position if it were possible to get one. In this day of hustle employers are calling for the younger men. Youth is a great factor nowadays in the commercial world for turning out a "good day's work," and a man at middle age gets scant attention when applying for a situation, regardless of his ability or experience. The laborer that is worthy of his hire in this generation must be able to produce abundantly. He is merely a "cog in the wheel" of the great industrial system.

I have heard of cases wherein men have made good after forty years of age who before were comparative failures, but they are few, and most of them were prisoners in their respective lines of endeavor.

What chance has a failure at forty?

Irrigate Your Neighborhood

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

HALF a century ago there were ten millions acres of land, within half a thousand miles of Omaha, upon which not even a blade of grass would grow. Today upon these very deserts are wonderful orchards and tremendous wheatfields. The soil itself was full of possibilities. What the land needed was water. In time there came farmers who knew that they could not expect the streams to come to them, and so they dug ditches and led the water to their properties from the surrounding rivers and lakes; they tilled the earth with their brains as well as their plows—they became rich through irrigation.

Advertising has made thousands of men rich, just because they recognized the possibilities of utilizing the newspapers to bring streams of buyers into neighborhoods that could be made busy locations by irrigation—by drawing people from other sections.

The successful retailer is the man who keeps the stream of purchasers coming his way. It isn't the spot itself that makes the store pay—it's the man who makes the spot pay. Centers of trade are not selected by the public—they are created by the force which controls the public—the newspapers.

New neighborhoods for business are being constantly built up by men who have located themselves in streets which they have changed from deserted by-ways into teeming, jostling thoroughfares, through advertising irrigation.

The storekeeper who whines that his neighborhood holds him back is squinting at the truth—he is hurting the neighborhood.

If it lacks streams of buyers, he can easily enough secure them by reaching out through the columns of the daily and inducing people from other sections to come to him. Every time he influences a customer of a competitor he is not only irrigating his own field but is diverting the streams upon which a non-advertising merchant depends for existence. Men and women who live next door to a shop that does not plead for their custom will eventually be drawn to an establishment miles away.

The circulation of every newspaper is nothing less than a reservoir of buyers, from which shoppers stream in the direction that promises the most value for the least money.

The magic development of the desert lands has its parallel in merchandising of the men who consider the newspaper an irrigating power which can make two customers grow where one grew before.

ONE SUMMER'S DAY.

By Lotta Burritt.

One day last summer while taking a little trip through the foothills of the Adirondacks (a hurried yet eventful trip) I encountered some difficulties but felt perfectly safe, for was traveling in a Ford car, the safest and most wonderful car for climbing the hills and getting out of ditches. After touring for some time, we became hungry and stopped at a hotel. The accommodations were so poor, I asked the landlord if there was another hotel in town and he said, "Yes, but the proprietor had gone South for his liver." "Why," said I, "Have you no meat market here?" Well, I went into the dining-room and the waiter said, "What will you have, steak or coffee?" I asked him if he had any fresh eggs. He brought me two. I opened one. He said, "Shall I open the other?" I said no; open the window. He said, what is the matter? Were they not cooked long enough? I said, I guess so, but they were not cooked soon enough.

At this point a man sitting at a table adjoining mine, had evidently ordered soup, for a waiter came in carrying a plate of soup. The man said, Waiter, excuse me, but your thumb is in my soup. He answered, O dat no mattah, Mistah Jones, the soup am not hot.

At my table a young man (who had traveled for several hours over the rough country) seated himself. The waiter at once tried to make himself useful and get a possible tip. Our friend asked him, Do you serve lobsters here? The waiter answered, yes, sah! What will you have? At this point I left the hotel and wandered across the green to a store and post office combined. A boy came up to inquire the way to a mill and was directed by a man who happened to stand outside, who said:

Of course, my boy, I will,
It's easy enough, and you can't go wrong,
For the road is perfectly straight,
And tho you may think the distance long,
It really is not so great.

You pass the church and the burrying-ground
Till you reach where the woods commence;
Then travel along until you have found
Some rocks and a hole in the fence,
Go thro' the fence and over the hill
Till you come to a willow tree,
And then you're about halfway to the mill,
And the Methodist church you'll see.

Go around the church and down the lane
And straight through the field of corn,
And there you'll see a barn with a vane
And the house where Smith was born,
You turn the corner and cross the bridge
And follow the old state road,
By a clump of trees, and over the ridge,
To a field that's just been mowed.

Then turn to your right and follow your nose
Till you've gone almost a mile;
Then thru the field where the barley grows
And then, (better rest awhile.)
You'll see a man with a load of wheat,
Or a man with a load of hay,
And remember, the very first one you meet,
To ask the rest of the way.

Ask anybody about it—Hanford's Balsam. adv

NEW ENGLAND PAPER SAYS CIRCUS IS CLEAN

(The Haverhill Herald.)

Bright and clean and overflowing with genuine acts of worth-while quality, La Tena's Big Wild Animal Circus played to capacity crowds here yesterday, pleasing young and old alike, with its excellent program of novel numbers, more than one of which would have done credit to a much more pretentious show. Everything about the show was clean and well regulated, the costuming and staging of the various acts was beyond reproach and the entire outfit proved one of even quality and considerabe merit.

It was Haverhil's second taste of circus entertainment this season and the show offered by the La Tena outfit was so far in advance of that given here by Wheeler Bros. last week that no comparison is possible. Both in the quality of the program and in the show, La Tena's circus proved a genuine credit to the show business as a whole.

Other animal acts worthy of more than passing notice were Walter Allen and his performing elephants, Buckman's bears, and last, but by no means least, Marguerite's lions. A fancy riding act, featuring a tango on horseback, savored of the Barnum and Bailey show and was done with grace and ability by two clever equestrian performers. The program also included a very clever troupe of wire walkers who did many novel tricks and a gifted family of contortionists besides a number of aerial performers of merit. Trained dogs, a small army of clowns and a host of other attractions added the necessary variety and all in all it was a very fine entertainment.

Our Form of Government Can't Be Worse

Good Men Have Tried to Make It Work and Have Failed, Because--

Where there should be	There has been
1. Simplicity	1. Complexity
2. Publicity	2. Obscurity
3. Responsibility	3. Irresponsibility
4. Efficiency	4. Inefficiency

The Commission-Manager Plan of Government Gives--

1. SIMPLICITY---Because there is a single council of five members, including the mayor who selects the city manager, who has entire charge of the administration.

2. PUBLICITY---Because the members of the council are elected at large and not by wards, and each member represents and, therefore, must stand the scrutiny of the whole city.

3. RESPONSIBILITY---Because the mayor has no veto power and the city manager is responsible solely to the council. They have all the power and cannot evade their responsibility to the people.

4. EFFICIENCY---Because the city manager is an expert in the city administration, employed for that purpose and giving his whole time to it, and because he can employ and discharge all his subordinates subject only to the restrictions of the Civil Service Law.

The Commission-Manager plan gives collective thinking on matters of policy and individual responsibility for the execution of that policy.

It is the application of Business Methods to city administration.

A dollar's worth for a dollar spent is the keynote of Commission-Manager Form.

Vote for Commission-Manager Form of Government on Sept. 17th and secure efficiency and a Lower Tax Rate.

Premature Flushing Resulted in Tearing Up Newly-Laid Bricks---Precautions Taken to Prevent More Trouble.

A misunderstanding of orders on the part of some city employes resulted in the contractors in charge of the paving of First st. at the Oneida st. corner having to tear up several hundred bricks which had been laid Monday, when the city employes flushed the street yesterday morning. The brick, according to the foreman of the work, must be perfectly dry when put down and must remain so until the filler of cement is put in. The company is prepared now to fill with cement all of the brick already laid, in the event of a sudden rain, for if the filler was not put in all of the bricks already down would have to be torn up again. Some 500 brick were made wet yesterday when the city employes flushed the street and these were taken up and dry bricks laid.

The contractors have completed a conduit from the eastern curb to the point at which the proposed lighting standard and isle of safety for trolley passengers will be placed. The Board of Public Works has not yet decided upon the installation of a standard but an early decision on this matter is expected. It is understood that a subscription list is in circulation and almost the entire cost of the lighting standard has been promised.

The contracting company is employing three experts on the brick work, who alternate. These men receive big pay and are veterans at the game. With a proper supply of brick they can lay about 15,000 brick a day.

PERCY BRACE HAS PASSED EARLY MILESTONE

Percy Brace, son of Mr. and Mrs. Abel Brace of Fifth st. was pleasantly surprised on the occasion of his fifteenth birthday last night by a large number of his young friends. The affair was arranged by John Shipman, who called for Mr. Brace early in the evening and took him out motoring. When they returned about 8:30 the Brace home was filled with youthful guests and the son of the house was too surprised for speech for some moments.

The evening was passed with games and musical entertainment and at a late hour a supper was served in the dining room with covers laid for thirty. Mr. Brace was the recipient of several handsome presents.

WEATHER FORECAST

Fair tonight and Thursday. Not much change in temperature. Moderate fresh south to south west winds.

PEACH SHORTCAKE NOT NECESSARILY EXPENSIVE

First a feast and then a famine applies to the peach crop this year and this year is a feast year. Housewives who are searching for peaches to can and preserve and for immediate table use need have no trouble in obtaining the finest quality of the fruit, for the crop this year is a bumper one and orchardists in the peach growing sections of the state are concerned regarding the marketing of their harvests.

Peaches and cream and peach shortcake—the good homemade kind—need no recommendation in Fulton. It doesn't take a cooking club or Housewives' League to bake a piece of peach pie, peach shortcake or force peaches and cream down the throats of most Fulton people.

The ordinary sized peach baskets—the tall ones holding upwards of a half bushel—retail in the stores at from 35 to 70 cents a basket, the quality being excellent.

The peach crop is so plentiful that prices should be low when the heft of the crop is thrown onto the market. Peaches are highly perishable and must move fast. Few are put in cold storage.

In New York it is planned to sell the fruit at auction and have the wholesale prices known to all. If the prices charged by the retailers are moderate it is expected that families will buy the half bushel baskets. Bulk purchases of this kind will help the retailer and his profits naturally be equalled by the increased volume of business.

The activity of the fruit exchange in New York should produce a big market there, it is figured, while the up-state sales should be greatly increased by the "Eat More Peaches" movement which has been started all over the country.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 1.—State construction work is likely to be seriously retarded if the proposed amendment to the Constitution, as outlined by the committee on Finance of the Constitutional Convention, is adopted and ratified by the people.

From the moment that the proposition in question made its appearance, officials identified with the State highway, State engineering and State architectual departments, realized that it aimed a severe blow at them.

The proposition of the committee on Finance which is objected to by the above officials provides that no public moneys or property shall be appropriated for the construction or improvement of any building, bridge, highway, dike, canal, feeder, waterway or other work until plans and estimates of the cost of such work shall have been filed with the secretary of State by the superintendent of public works, together with a certificate by him as to whether or not in his judgment the general interests of the State then require that such improvement be made at State expense.

Under the present order of things which is a custom of long standing, before any improvement is made surveys and maps are made so as to permit those identified with the improvement to form some idea as to the cost of the improvement. The contemplated plan would absolutely prohibit the spending of moneys at present used for these surveys from being used for that purpose.

Is is the belief of several State heads of departments that should any contemplated amendment become effective, that the least detrimental result would be the delaying of the letting of contracts for at least a year. These officials contend that even more serious results are possible.

One of the arguments advanced against the proposition is that if the money for the making of surveys and the preparation of plans can no longer be obtained under the present method the funds necessary for that purpose will naturally have to be taken from the general fund, thus tending to create a direct tax.

"It is quite possible that there may be no further public structures if this proposition prevails, unless—the legislature shall provide a contingent fund each year,' said one of the foes of the plan of the committee on Finance.

That thep roposed amendment will be bitterly opposed is obvious and it may be that it will fail to reach the third reading calendar, in that the heads of the three State departments it will most vitally affect, namely the State highway commissioner, the State superintendent of public works and the State Engineer, are firm in their belief that it should die on the general orders calendar or be recommitted and thus be put an end to.

Legislative committees are now touring the State and visiting charitable institutions for the purpose of determining whether there is need for additional buildings to facilitate the work of such institutions. If the proposition of the committee on Finance prevails, recommendations for new buildings will be unavailing. Highways and other public work will fare likewise, it would seem.

FUTURITY WILL BE RUN AS LONG AS HORSES RACE

New York, Sept. 1—There is no race in this country that has as much sentiment connected with it as the Futurity Stakes for two-year-olds, which will be run at Belmont Park the coming Saturday, during the autumn meeting of the Westchester Raceing Association.

The fact that it is the most valuable prize for which thoroughbreds contest in the United States—it will be worth upward of $25,000 this autumn —is not alone responsible for the glamour surrounding it. There is above and beyond the financial return the satisfaction which comes to every man when he does something better than his fellows, and thef act that the breeders of the first three horses share in the spoils keeps the interest in the race alive from the day the dam is named for the prize. It is the race thate very breeder of thoroughbreds hopes to win some day, and ft waaw orth to a single individual $77,000 in 1890.

RACING COMMISSIONERS CLAIM MUTUELS LEGAL

Denver, Col., Sept. 1.—President J. A. Burnett of the State Racing Commission will not tender his resignation in response to the demand of the Governor, following the belated discovery by Governor Carlson that money was bet on horses at Overland Parkl ast June. Friends of Dr. M. J. Dunleavy, also of the commission, say he will follow Burnett's example.

Three weeks ago Burnett told the Governor he would resign January 1st next, becauseb usines demanded his attention.

"The commission is upheld in its belief that the pari-mutuel system is legal by the decisions of the Supreme Courts of several Eastern States. The Colorado courts have rendered no decision to the contrary."

NUT TREES GOOD FOR EVERY YARD

Experts at Rochester Convention Advise Planting Grafted Trees and Giving Nut Trees Preference.

Rochester, Aug. 31.—"Everybody who has a place to plant a tree should set a grafted nut tree. Every farmer should have nut trees about the house and barn. Every owner of a village plot, or even of a city back yard, should have a nut tree. Don't set the ailanthus, poplar and soft maple; they are only bunches of leaves and sticks. Grow a tree that produces something to eat in addition to beauty and shade.'

This is the advice of Dr. William C. Deming, secretary of the Northern Nut Growers' Association, which is to hold its sixth annual meeting tomorrow. The object of the association is the promotion of interest in nut-producing plants. their products and their culture. Its leading and most active members are men of wide experience based upon experiment and close study of the nut trees indigenous to the United States.

Here and there in the forests of Southern Indiana has been found a pecan tree bearing nuts of superior quality; these trees haveb een named and from them are propagated, by grafting and budding, hundreds and thousands of nursery trees for planting in various parts of the country suited to these varieties. This must be the process to have nuts from the new trees as good or better than those of the parent tree. It is the process by which high grade apples, peaches and other fruits are propagated. One may plant a nut, as he may plant an apple seed, but the resulting fruit will rarely equal thep roduct of the parent tree.

The largest and oldest grove of English walnuts in Western New York, and indeed in this part of the country, is that of Adelbert Thompson, at East Avon. Mr. Thompso twenty-eight years ago planted eight hundred walnuts, which hep rocured from the late Mathias Kramer, Lake avenue and Emerson street, this city. Two hundred and twenty-eight of the trees which resulted from the planting are bearing heavily this year. The nuts are of good average quality.

Perhaps the finest English walnuts grown in Western New York are those on the Holden trees in Hilton, Monroe county. Dr. R. A. Adams, of No. 3 Upton park, who harvests annually about thirty tons of walnuts on his California properities, says the Holden nuts compare favorably with walnuts grown in California.

There is plenty of evidence that the English walnut will grow and bear nuts in this climate. What the Northern Nut Growers' Association would impress upon the public is that budded and grafted trees planted in groves not only will bear earlier, but also will bear better nuts than the seedings noted, practically all of which have arrived at their present age wholly without special care. Men do not plant orchards of fruit trees as these isolated cases of nut trees originated.

It is argued that the same care that is bestowed upon fruit-growing would produce big returns in nut-g-rowing. The beginning has been made in the South with the pecan and in California with the almond and walnut. European chestnut orchards equal in value acre for acre, the Illinois corn belt. A pecan tree in Georgia gave a crop valued at $100 for three years in succession. One such tree on an acre would be more valuable than all the wheat that could be grown on it, and with hardly any labor.

CORNING POWER CO. SETTLES WITH LINEMAN

Corning, Sept. 1.—Arthur W. Johnston, a lineman employed by the Federal Telephone Company in Corning August 21, 1914, when he nearly lost his life by coming into contact with a 2,200 volt electric wire while he was on top of a telephone polel ooking for trouble, has received $8,500 from the Corning Light & Power Company in settlement of all his claims against that company as the result of the accident. Johnston will drop the suit for $25,000 damages which he had instituted and which was to have been tried at thec oming term of Supreme Court in Bath.

THRIFT STUDIED IN THE SCHOOLS

That is the Plan of Rochester's Board of Education, Now, Along With Two R's

Rochester, Sept. 1.—The school Board of this city has adopted the Barrows's plan for savings bank system in the severalg rades.

At a meeting yesterday of the Board of Education, a resolution proposing to introduce in the public schools of Rochester the school-savings-bank plan, was passed with the unanimous approval of the commissioners. The Rochester Savings Bank has been named as the depository for the funds, and October 4th as the time when the teachers will begin to give instructions in the new subject.

Once a week children will turn in their accumulated savings to their respective teachers; the teachers will credit each amount in a little book owned by the depositor; the principal will receive the total deposit for the school, and the bank will collect it. When the individual child's deposit touches $3 a bank book will be issued and the account will begin to accumulate interest.

The Rochester Savings Bank, Commissioner Barrows said, has entered enthusiastically into the plan and will open a new department for the exclusive transaction of school children patrons.

Between the opening of school and the arrival of the day for first deposits the Board of Education will carry on a campaign among parents as well as children. Parents will be made responsible for the growth of their children's accounts, since the Board of Education has decided that withdrawals will not be authorized except with their consent.

Commissioner Barrows thinks the qualities cultivated by early instruction in saving money will be of inestimable value.

"Especially," he commented, "at this day and age, when our motto is 'how much can we spend,' instead of 'how much we can save.'"

The resolution adopted by the board follows:

Resolved, That as a means of developing in the lives of our school children those habits of thrift which are so essential to personal character and to good citizenship, the school savings bank plan be introduced into each of the public elementary schools of the city of Rochester, beginning October 4, 1915, and that the Rochester Savings Bank be designated as the depository for these funds.

The time to change your living place is before the fall rush begins. Advertise your wants in The Evening Times.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

Harmony House

The "Good Angel" of the Home

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Harmony House dwelt in the midst of pleasant green lawns, noble trees and many scattered flower beds.

The rooms were arranged in suits of three small bedrooms, bath and sitting room, and to each suit the management allotted three "guests" of the house—spinsters of fifty and over and indigent childless widows.

This "home," with its annual fee of $50 each, assured the inmates a home for life provided peace dwelt within its walls. In case of dissension the malefactor must bid farewell to Harmony House forever.

And Harmony House had been the gift of Miss Keziah Todd, a peace loving spinster of ample means.

Her portrait hung over the high mantelpiece in the front hall and gazed benignantly down upon the guests of Harmony House, whose lives she had tried to brighten while her own faded away into another world.

It was March, and there was a hint of spring in the sharp air, even though the snow lay eight inches deep over lawns, fields and highway.

Five o'clock of a March afternoon, and twenty-four guests of Harmony House gathered in the general sitting room on the first floor. Promptly at 6 Hepsy Biddle, the housekeeper, would announce supper, and if it wasn't Hepsy Biddle it would be one of the waitresses. Anyway, some one would ring the supper bell.

"I hope it's Hepsy. I want to ask her about the new lady who came this afternoon," fussed Mrs. Bennett.

"I saw her," remarked Alicia Pearson—"small and scrawny, like a little canary."

Some one laughed.

"I wonder if she sings like one?" tittered Ellen Smith, her false teeth clicking in unison with her tongue.

A sharp voice broke in from the doorway, a strange voice, the voice of the newcomer.

"I can tell you I don't sing like a canary!" it snapped. "And I don't cackle like a hen or titter like a guinea hen! Oh, good evening, Mrs. Biddle!"

Over the tiny form of the irate newcomer Hepsy Biddle loomed like an angel of peace.

"Why, Miss Olivia, I didn't know you had arrived! Did some one show you your room?"

"The girl did," said Olivia Ladd. "And she said it was most supper time, so I came down."

"That's right. Make yourself at home. I'll introduce you to your roommates, and they can introduce you to the rest."

Hepsy led Olivia up to Alicia Pearson and Ellen Smith.

They both bowed and said, "Pleased to meet you." And Olivia stared hard at them and said pertly:

"Pleased to meet you, I'm sure!"

Hepsy drifted away toward the kitchen, and Olivia was left in the middle of the sitting room, with forty-eight eyes focused on her sprightly little form.

Olivia Ladd wore a black cashmere skirt, made narrow in the latest mode. She wore black high heeled slippers, with silver buckles, and a white shirt waist with a sailor collar that showed a stringy little throat that was quivering more than its owner would admit.

Olivia's pale sandy hair was coiled in two small flat circles behind her ears. Her blue eyes had a strained look, and there were hard little lines around her nose and mouth.

Not one of the women present dreamed that Olivia Ladd had reached what appeared to her a haven of refuge.

For thirty years she had been a dressmaker, out by the day, and, having considered long and carefully how to invest her savings, she had been sent to the management of Harmony House.

"I'm going to do nothing for weeks and weeks," Olivia had promised herself. So she fixed up her wardrobe and felt a sense of triumph in descending upon the rural inmates of Harmony House in the glory of up to date clothes.

"I shall never make clothes for any one except myself," was another promise Olivia had made. She felt rather forlorn in the midst of the women, and for one instant she longed for her tiny room in the crowded city.

But the old fighting spirit was in her, and she tossed her head and remarked pleasantly:

"I suppose there's a chair for me, but I don't seem to see it."

Mrs. Mattie Jones laughed good naturedly.

"It's right behind me, Miss Ladd. I'm so fat that I shut off all the view. Here, Miss Ambler, shove that chair around for Miss Ladd. Now, you sit down by me and tell me all the news from the city."

Olivia thanked Mrs. Jones and took the chair. She told her about the snow blockade on the city streets, about the near accident on the railroad and finally how she had dropped a cherished plant—a rose geranium—on the station platform and had seen it crushed to atoms by a heavy baggage truck.

She spoke of the latest and most thrilling news of the war, the sinking of ships by submarines, news which seemingly had not come to the ears of good natured, laughing Mrs. Jones. After the usual questions and exclamations of horror she passed on to other news.

"Never mind, my dear," reassured Mrs. Jones, patting Olivia's hand. "I've got two rose geraniums, all budded. My plant was so big that I divided it, thinking maybe some one would like one of them. I guess I was saving it for you!"

"You are very kind. I shall like you so much," said Olivia warmly, and the two women went out to supper in a glow of good feeling.

During the meal Olivia talked to some of the other women and liked it—all except Ellen Smith and Alicia Pearson, who shared the same suit with the newcomer.

"It's just my luck," thought Olivia forlornly. "I wish I had shared some rooms with Mattie Jones or that Miss Ambler."

The evening passed quickly with fancy work, conversation and music from a large phonograph.

At 10 o'clock Mattie Jones got up and said good night. Her departure was the signal for a general exodus, and as the women went out Olivia's bright eyes had inventoried each one's appearance and found it wanting in style. Their skirts were too full, their shirtwaists were out of date and all of them wore either black or white—most trying of all tints to one who is no longer young.

"I don't wonder they look cranky," said Olivia as she went up to her room. "What they need are cheerful clothes to liven them up. Take Mrs. Jones, with her white hair. She would look sweet in pink, like Mrs. Judge Latimer used to wear."

Olivia passed through the tiny hall that led to her room.

Miss Pearson and Ellen Smith were in adjoining rooms talking to each other while they prepared for bed.

"It may be the style," Ellen was saying, "but I don't think it's proper to wear skirts that tight."

"Oh, pshaw!" retorted Alicia Pearson. "Seems as if I'd relish a skirt that didn't blow out like a balloon."

"Alicia! Would you wear such a tight skirt?" demanded Ellen in a horrified tone.

"I'd wear anything different," retorted Alicia recklessly. "I'm sick of looking so old and middle aged."

"You can't help it. You are middle aged," snapped back Ellen. "I suppose you'd like to wear your hair in two little coils behind your ears," she sneered.

"I'm trying it that way now," said Alicia coolly.

"Let me see! Alicia Pearson, if you don't look like the old Nick!" gasped Ellen.

At that moment Olivia appeared in the door. She wore a low necked lace trimmed nightgown, and there was a giddy little blue bow at the throat and on each apology for a sleeve. Her ginger colored hair was neatly braided and tied with blue ribbons.

"I thought I'd like to say good night to some one," she said rather timidly. "I've lived alone in a boarding house for so many years, and when I thought of coming here I kept thinking it would be like home—so many lonesome women glad to get together."

"Good land!" gasped amazed Ellen.

"Come in and sit down," invited Alicia. "I'm trying to do my hair like yours. How do you manage it?"

Olivia showed her. Then Ellen's scanty gray locks were brushed into a fluffy mass on top of her head instead of its usual tight knot.

They fell to exchanging confidences, and finally they talked about clothes. Olivia was in her glory.

Then she gave them her confidence and told the story of her weary years at dressmaking and how being able to alter their clothes would be a pleasure instead of a drudgery.

Long after the lights were out and each woman was in her narrow bed they continued to talk back and forth until Hepsy Biddle knocked on the door for quiet.

The next morning Olivia formed a sewing club. Every member of Harmony House joined at once. They gathered about the newcomer with workbaskets and out of date garments, and Olivia showed them how to alter and make over gowns and coats and hats.

"You'll wear yourself out, Miss Olivia," expostulated Hepsy Biddle one day.

"I never was so happy in my life," returned Olivia. "We have such good times sewing together, Miss Biddle, and it's like one big family here. Seems like they're all my sisters and they need me. That's the happiest thought of all."

Hepsy nodded.

"I suppose some folks would say clothes making was a sin, but I say anything that brings joy and peace to lonely hearts is all right. And quarrels mostly begin through idleness. So I think if Miss Todd was only here she'd shake hands with you and say you were the good angel of Harmony House. They've stopped squabbling, thank goodness."

Olivia blushed to the roots of her gingery hair.

"I'm so happy I don't know what to do," half sobbed Olivia as she ran down the steps of Harmony House.

"I think they're calling you to come over and play croquet," said Hepsy, with twinkling eyes, for the lawn of Harmony House was sprinkled with all the members of the big family. They walked freely in the grass and swung their mallets with vigor.

Their remodeled gowns may have been entirely inappropriate to sober middle age, and the freakish coiffures may have seemed ridiculous, but they were entirely happy.

A WOMAN OF DEEP MYSTERY

Tale of Strange Happenings at an Army Post.

Few United States army people remember the mystery which occurred at Fort C. many years ago, a mystery which has never to this day and doubtless never will be revealed. Those under whose notice it took place are now either on the retired list or dead. Yet here and there dozing over a newspaper at some army or navy club a white headed old man may be found who can give the circumstances.

One day away back in the last century guests were assembling at the quarters of Colonel Athern, commanding Fort C., to celebrate the wedding of the colonel's niece, Miss Roxana Bonfield, with Lieutenant Reginald Allen. Allen had secured a leave or had been sent away on some duty—it was claimed that he was purposely absent—and was to have returned for a bachelor farewell dinner he was to give on the evening before the wedding. There were no mails or telegraphs handy at that time by which he could send any word, and when he did not appear for the dinner it was supposed he had been unavoidably detained. But when the garrison clock struck 12 the next day, the hour appointed for the ceremony, and he did not appear there was a hum of surprise.

Allen never did appear again at Fort C. The lady he was to have married bore the slight put upon her so well, never uttering a word of blame, that she received the sympathy of every one. Not a person at the fort who afterward met Lieutenant Allen—he offered no explanation of his conduct—but gave him a dead cut.

Five years after his disappointment Miss Bonfield engaged herself to Captain Gregg. The engagement occurred just before Gregg was ordered to another post. Certain young wags with more love of saying mean things than delicacy debated among themselves if Gregg would behave as Allen had behaved. But Gregg, after being engaged for six months, during all of which time he was absent from his fiancee, returned in ample time for the wedding.

There is no record that any disagreement ever occurred between Captain and Mrs. Gregg. During the first few months of their marriage Gregg appeared as a devoted and happy husband. Then one day when he went on duty he gave evidence of having received a shock. To inquiries as to his health he replied that he was never better. Nevertheless he had a hunted look and lost flesh till his uniform hung about him in deep creases. While the loving devotion he had shown his wife did not continue, he was perfectly respectful and attentive to her. What surprised every one was that she did not treat him or appear to worry about him as a sick man.

Gregg finally got a year's leave and went abroad—without his wife. At the end of the year he returned in fair condition, but with something of the hunted look left, and rejoined his wife. In six months he was sent to a retreat, where he died a few years later.

Mrs. Gregg was now a woman of twenty-eight. She had no children and did not look her age. The unfortunate endings of her love affairs had not seemed to cast any cloud over her. She was not at all depressed. She appeared simply as any other young woman whose husband had died and left her a widow. Her widowhood was short. In eighteen months after Gregg's death she became the wife of Major Thurston. Then the young wags wondered if she was going to climb the ladder of rank till she married a general.

Thurston's sister, an army woman, begged him not to marry Mrs. Gregg. But when the brother asked for reasons he got nothing except what has been told thus far in this story—that is, that the woman had been treated shamefully by her first fiance and that her husband had died of some brain or nervous trouble. The major declined to act the part of the first and saw no reason why he should fear the fate of the second. The sister still protested; but, without a reason, he declined to change his course. He married Mrs. Gregg and ten weeks later committed suicide.

Thurston is not the first man who has made a mistake by not heeding a woman's warning because no good or sufficient reason accompanied it. Women have been known to be right in condemning a man from the shape of his nose. However, there was not the slightest proof that Mrs. Thurston had any direct or indirect influence on her husband's suicide. What surprised every one was that this climax to her unfortunate matrimonial affairs seemed to have no more effect upon her than either of the other cases. She seemed perfectly passive under each and all of them. Nevertheless she did not marry again, though it was reported that several men at different times were attentive to her. It was supposed that on learning her marital record they desisted.

Mrs. Gregg-Thurston died when she was past fifty. No explanation was ever given of the blight that fell on her lovers, but there was a story told by the physician who brought her into the world that her mother a few months before the child's birth had been frightened by a snake.

May not Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes' character of Elsie Venner, whose mother suffered a similar fright, the child inheriting serpentine traits, explain the mystery of Roxana Bonfield?

For Young Folks

A Boy Who Has a Big Rooster For a Pet.

Quite an unusual pet is that possessed by a Pennsylvania boy. It is a big Cochin rooster, and it is very fond of its master and follows him about when permitted to do so. Since a little chick just out of the shell the boy has fed and cared for the bird, and of course the little chick learned to love its master. Now that he has grown to be a big rooster he shows the same affection and likes to be petted. The hen family is said to be lacking in intelligence, but this big fellow is said almost to understand what the boy says to it, and will obey when ordered to go to his coop and do other smart things. Of course it has always been treated with kindness, and that goes a long way with all creatures.

Legend of the Daisy.

According to the Celtic belief, every newborn baby that died became a spirit and to comfort its sorrowing parents it would scatter some kind of flower from the sky.

A woman named Malvina lost her little son and grieved so long and so hard that her friends tried to turn her thoughts some other way.

Her friends made up a song, which was sung to her by a number of young women. The song told about their seeing her little son on a light cloud which hung near the earth. He had a lot of new flowers, one of which was a gold circle with silver leaves, tinted with red around it. When it waved in the wind it looked like a little baby playing in a green meadow. The baby in the cloud threw this pretty little flower to the ground, where it took root and grew, according to the song. The women took a bunch of daisies to Malvina and said these were the flowers thrown by her son.

Since then the daisy has been called the flower of innocence, because it is supposed to have been the flower of the newborn.

About the Umbrella.

There is a very general belief that umbrellas were invented and first used by Jonas Hanway, the celebrated English philanthropist. This is an error. Hanway was perhaps the first man who walked the London streets with an umbrella over his head to keep off the rain, and we are told that "after continuing to use one for thirty years he saw them come into general use." He died in 1786, so that the date when he introduced them must have been between 1750 and 1760. The earliest use of umbrellas, however, dates back 2,000 or 3,000 years before this. On one of the bas-reliefs brought from Nineveh by Layard and now in the British museum there is a representation of a slave holding an umbrella over the head of the king as he rides in his chariot.

Overheard in the Hall.

"You all think yourselves really more than you really are!" exclaimed the riding whip, which was hanging on the top peg of the hatrack. "If I had a mind to I could whip the whole crowd of you, and I'll do it, too, if I hear any more boasting."

CARE OF GOOD CLOTHES.

The Finer the Stuff the More Watchful One Should Be.

It is a very common mistake to believe that good materials, whether of cotton, silk or wool, need less care than cheap ones. How often does one complain of the lack of wearing quality in a garment for which a big price has been paid. Yet, most frequently, what has worn out the fabric has not been actual use, but the neglect it has suffered.

One of the principal differences between good and cheap materials is that the better grades are finer spun. This may mean that the fabric is stronger and, in proportion to the uses to which it is put, may wear longer, but it also means that each tiny thread by itself is weaker and more apt to injury. Anything which may attack the threads one by one, therefore, does more harm with fine goods than with coarse.

No matter how careful one may try to be, clothes that one wears gradually get a trifle of the grease from the perspiration of the body. In spite of constant watching clothes will become dusty. This combination of dust and body moisture forms a regular breeding ground for tiny little vegetable growths. These are so small that it takes the most powerful microscope even to see them.

In themselves these bacteria do but little harm, but many of them set free an acid which eats into the fiber of the material. If the individual fiber is coarse the deposit of the acid upon it is not enough to eat all the way through, but if it is sheer or woven of fine threads one by one the threads are eaten through and the texture weakened.

Good clothing, instead of being kept shut away in boxes and drawers, should be constantly aired and shaken. The finer the material the more often should it be looked after. A coarse piece of goods will wear out by using, a fine piece by being laid away.—New York American.

MILITARY STRATEGY.

Retreating Through a City Is Disastrous to an Army.

If you suffer defeat in front of a great town and have to retreat through it under the blows of the victorious enemy you are in the worst possible position for conducting that retreat. The streets of the town (but few of which will run parallel to your course and can, therefore, serve as avenues of escape for your army) are so many defiles in which your columns will get hopelessly congested. The operation may be compared to the pouring of too much liquid into a funnel which has too small an orifice. Masses of your transport will remain clogged outside the place. You will run the risk of a partial and perhaps of a complete disaster as the enemy presses on.

There is very much more than this. A great town cannot but contain, if you have long occupied it, the material of your organization. You will probably abandon documents which the enemy should not see. You will certainly, in the pressure of such a flight, lose accumulated stores. Again, the transverse streets are so many points of "leakage" into which your congested columns will bulge out and get confused. Again, you will be almost necessarily dealing with the complications of a mass of civilian conditions which should never be allowed to interrupt a military operation.

In general, to fight in front of a great town when the chances are against you is as great an error as to fight in front of a marsh with few causeways. So far as mere topography is concerned, it is a greater error still.—From "The Elements of the Great War," by Hilaire Belloc.

Seville Nights.

In all the principal places and gardens of Seville moving picture screens are erected and small tables and chairs set out, the exhibitors either making their profits from the drinks sold or by rental of chairs at 2 cents each. Thousands of people go nightly to the different plazas and gardens, and the entire life of the city for about four months centers around these moving picture shows.—Commerce Reports.

Leakage In Steam Pipes.

To make a permanent cement for stopping leakage in steam pipes where caulking or plugging is impossible, mix black oxide of manganese and raw linseed oil, using enough oil with the manganese to bring it to a thick paste. Apply to the pipe or joint at leak. If the pipe be kept sufficiently warm to absorb the oil from the manganese, in twenty-four hours the cement will be as hard as the iron pipe.

SERGE AND SATIN, BUTTONS AND BRAID.

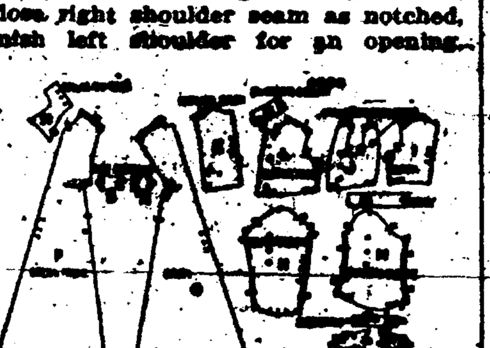
A princess frock of dark colored serge, having an extra back that may be applied in coat effect. It is worn over a black satin guimpe and trimmed with braid and buttons.

Two different kinds of material with as many kinds of trimming enter into the composition of this handsome Autumn frock.

To reproduce the model in medium size requires 3⅞ yards 36-inch material, with ⅝ yard satin for the guimpe, 7 yards of braid for the trimming and one dozen buttons.

Begin making by bringing "T" to corresponding double "oo" perforation, to form pleats, then close seam as notched, leaving the seam on left side free above large "O" perforation in front for opening. Join the two belt sections (on right side), notches even. Adjust to position on front and back, corresponding notches and small "o" perforations even. If dress is desired with applied back, pleat applied back placing "T" on corresponding double "oo" perforation. Arrange on dress back, center-backs, neck and shoulder edges even; bring the single large and small "o" perforations together and tack. Close right shoulder seam as notched, finish left shoulder for an opening.



Face collar and rever and sew to neck edge, notches and center-backs even.

The under-arm seam of the guimpe should now be closed so the facing may be adjusted to position on front and back, shoulder and armhole edges even. Stitch lower edges together, bringing small "o" perforation in facing to under-arm seam. Close shoulder seam as notched. Turn hem in front at notches. Sew standing collar to neck edge as notched; large "O" perforations indicate center-front.

Pleat the sleeve by bringing "T" to corresponding small "o" perforations, then close the seam. Sew in armhole of guimpe as notched and finish the wrists with a piping of self-material or frill of lace.

The braid and buttons make an effective finish for the dress.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

An economical wardrobe is here given for the young girl who follows in a modified degree the fashions of her elders. That means for this year flaring skirt, short or round waist, still some jumpers—always a useful style for remodeling old frocks—short coats, usually belted for the young girl, though Eton and bolero jackets are coming to the fore.

From three to three and a half yards round is a good width for the skirt of a schoolgirl, which should reach to her shoe tops. The excessive flare, often seven and eight yards around, not only takes more material, but means much more sewing and is far from girlish.

The skirts are not especially hard to make, as they are kept rather close fitting around the hips, and the flare is made by the cut. Often the skirt is gathered to the waist band, sometimes laid in plaits, and some pretty girlish models show the fullness held in by shirrings at the hip.

Tucks around the skirts are a favorite trimming. A girlish trimming is a three inch hem at the bottom of the skirt with two three inch tucks six inches apart.

For the separate waists three may be of madras or lawn made on tailored lines. Often the young girl makes all her sport blouses over the "middy" pattern. Both long and three-quarter sleeves are permissible, and the neck is slightly V. The collars may be attached or adjustable, as preferred.

Three blouses may be of mull, batiste, dotted swiss or, far best of all, over lace in a girlish design of dot or small flower of point d'esprit.

A fine serge is the nicest thing for a middy suit. One of the cotton gowns may be a middy in white kindergarten cloth, to which there may be several sets of collars and cuffs—one dull blue, another rose, a third white with red or blue bandings or mercerized braid. Another cotton gown may be pink chambray made without other trimming than tucks. This is good either on jumper lines to be worn with white guimpe or with a single breasted blouse opening up the front, slightly V neck and worn with white all over embroidery or embroidered linen cuffs and collars.

For the afternoon dresses lawn, dimity, dotted swiss, cotton voile, linen—though it wrinkles badly—mull and batiste are all good. For the silk foulard or india silk give girlish models. Be sure they are spot proof; better yet, that they wash. The suit may be of serge, covert cloth or poplin. Soft tones are popular, but a warm navy blue is the best choice for a girl who must wear her suit two years. If there is a good suit from last year, provided the skirt is not too narrow—the new suit may be of white serge for best wear. This dyes well when it has been cleaned several times.

For the sport coat choose a lightweight tweed or one of the summer weight chinchillas or wool mixtures. These are more sensible than the linen or fancy mercerized silk and cotton mixtures that are stylish, but do not give enough protection after tennis and other heating sports.

For the dancing dresses, which may include a graduation gown, mulls, embroidered batiste, nets—dotted, plain or the new craquele patterns—or flowered organdies are dainty, girlish and inexpensive. They are far nicer for summer wear than crepe de chine, chiffon or silks.

How to Make Attractive and Serviceable Bed Comforts.

Any of the new flowered silk or silkaline goods make handsome bed comforts with very little trouble and at small cost. They may be filled with cotton wadding, or old blankets may be used for the filling in place of the wadding. They should be about two yards square.

A dainty pink and green flower spray on a white ground is pretty, bound around the edge with plain silkaline. Pink zephyr tufting holds the material together in the center, while the edges are stitched by machine.

When comforts are made of silk the border should be placed at the extreme edge of the comfort, because silk does not come as wide as silkaline. Japanese silk is especially attractive for the purpose. Silk muslins, both plain and fancy, are much used for bed comforts.

How to Make Brazil Nut Salad.

Shred crisp and well washed celery and cut up rather fine, or in only four or five pieces, each kernel of an equal quantity of Brazil nuts. Mix these together and dress with mayonnaise dressing. Tiny dice of bread and butter are sometimes added to this salad and a cream dressing added. Salt rising bread cut first in thin slices, heavily buttered and used in this combination, adds food value and novelty. It is an English vegetarian's idea.

How to Remove Rust Stains.

Rust stains can be easily removed by putting vinegar and salt on the stain and placing it in the warm sunshine. Repeat this until the stain is removed. The vinegar and salt together are very active and will remove the stain more quickly than lemon and salt.

WINDING THE CLOCK.

Follow This System and You May Get More Accurate Time.

You cannot secure the best services from a good watch or clock unless you know how to wind them so as to cause the least wear and irregularity in their delicate machinery.

A watch should be wound at the same time every day. If allowed to run down or even almost do so and then wound up until it will not wind any further it cannot do as perfect work as a watch that is not allowed to run to its full capacity or wound up until it is as tight as it can be made.

If a watch is wound both morning and evening at about the same hour and the key is given only enough turns to wind it a little less than half what it could be wound the watch will run more evenly, wear much longer and keep more accurate time than if it is wound up tight once a day.

A watch spring will last longer if it is wound when there is the least extreme of temperature, and morning and evening are, of course, the best in that respect.

It is more or less dangerous to wind a watch during a heavy electric storm, and it is best to avoid winding while on an electric car.

An eight day clock should be wound twice a week at as regular periods as possible to secure the best results. Never allow the clock to run down, and if possible do not wind it until it is tight.

Learn by experience just how many turns of the key it takes to wind the clock to run eight days and then when half of the week is gone wind the clock by giving the key just half as many turns as it would require to wind it all the way. More accurate time will be had and it will avoid placing any of the parts in a strain, which is frequently the cause of good clocks giving out in some particular before they have served half as long as they should.

A little attention to this advice will lengthen the life of any watch or clock and make it a better timepiece.—New York American.

Add enough flour to make dumplings. Cook in boiling water from fifteen to twenty minutes. Sprinkle with chopped onions fried in butter when about to serve.

Green Peas a la Menagere.

Cook two cupfuls peas in a stewpan with butter. Add a few small onions and several hearts of lettuce finely chopped. Season with pepper, salt and a small lump of sugar. Add a little butter before they are cooked.

Endives a la Creme.

Take off the coarsest outer leaves and pull three endives apart. Wash thoroughly in salted water and boil like spinach, pressing out all the water. Chop fine and pass through sieve, adding enough melted butter to make it the consistency of spinach. Season with salt and pepper. Cook thoroughly for ten minutes.

Salmon Gravy.

To half cupful salmon allow a cupful or more of water. Season with salt and plenty of pepper and thicken with a teaspoonful corn starch. This is very nice either with pancakes, potatoes or toast. It is a good way to use left over salmon.

Lemon Whey.—One-fourth cupful of milk and two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice. Add lemon juice to milk and let stand five minutes. Strain through double cheesecloth and sweeten, if liked.

Junket.—Three-fourths cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of cold water, one-fourth junket tablet or one teaspoonful of liquid rennet. Heat the milk until lukewarm, and add the tablet or rennet, which first has been dissolved in the cold water. Let stand in a warm place until set, then stir, using a silver spoon until thoroughly separated. Strain through double cheesecloth.

A FAMOUS MISER.

Cooke Died Wealthy After a Life of Petty Saving and Trickery.

Thomas Cooke, known as the "Islington miser," left at his death more than $300,000. His whole life was one of penury, petty saving and petty trickery. He made it a habit in order to get meals for nothing to fall in a pretended fit in front of a house at dinner time and on recovering he would naturally be invited to share the meal, which he always did after the proper amount of protestation. Often he would pretend to these kind people that they had saved his life, would make a great fuss over them and tell them he intended to remember them or their children in his will.

One man, a poor relation, occasionally sent him small presents of butter. This angered Cooke, who said to him: "Why send me such driblets, you who are to get thousands and thousands at my death? Send me a firkin." The firkin and several more were sent, but neither this legacy nor any of the others came to reality.

Like many men shrewd in petty ways, he was easily deceived in matters out of his own line. Thus once when his horse was sick he was too mean to pay a horse doctor and asked advice of a quack, who told him he must take thirty onions, drill a hole through each, put them on a string, put the necklace around the horse's neck and let it stay there. The expense of thirty onions was too much; he bought fifteen, and when, after many days, they had served their purpose, he took them to the servant and ordered her to make an onion porridge for the day's dinner.—Exchange.

Homemade Toothpowder.

An effective tooth powder which can be always recommended is made as follows: One ounce of precipitated chalk, half an ounce of carbonate of soda, half an ounce of powdered orris root. Mix well together and pass three times through a sieve. Place in a bottle or in tins until required for use. The carbonate of soda removes the grease from the teeth and prevents decay, and the powdered orris root keeps the gums healthy.

FRENCH SENATOR SEES DEFEAT FOR ALLIED POWERS

By CHARLES HUMBERT.
Senator from the Department of the Meuse

Paris, Aug. 31.—After one year's war it is almost disheartening to see the German organization still advantageously resisting the coalition formed against it.

This situation seems a challenge against logic. With their forces and resources the allied countries should be able to speedily defeat the Germanic empires.

Why, then, do we have to wait so long for victory?

The answer is easy. Thanks to thorough preparation, Germany has put into immediate movement the totality of her power, each fighter brought up to the maximum of his value. Her marvellous armament has been maintained at the highest degree of perfection.

On the contrary, the enormous theoretically allied force can only be partially and progressively put in line.

The Teutonic forces have another most important advantage in their unity. Only Germany commands. Neither Austria nor Turkey really has the right to call hersef an ally of Germany. One is a vassal, the other a subject.

The Kaiser, his Ministers and his General Staff supervise the entire coalition and employ the common resources to the best general interest. That interest is the German interests.

Some clever persons, scientifically inclined, have suggested that the allies adopt thes ame unity of action; that a common commandant be appointed who would co-ordinate the initiative on all fronts. Right idea. But where, for instance, would that common commandant reside? How would he receive the information? How could he assure himself that the orders were executed?

It really seems that to attain victory allied forces must institute among themselves a closer co-operation and a real and effective division of their task.

France, which has proportionately mobolized the greatest legions and most complete armaments, finds herself at a loss through lack of basic industrial materials.

England, wealthy in coal and minerals, and full of giant manufactories, has, as yet, only a small army. It is her duty to mobolize all her economic as well as all her military forces.

Italy, which we must admire for her excellent organizations and admirable valor, has availed herself of only a part of her population.

Japan, the only allied country in a complete state of preparation, has participated only partially in the war.

Immense and deep Russia, the inexhaustible reserve of the allies full of men not yet called, delays mobilization through lack of armament and financial resourees.

Belgium and Serbia,a ggrandized by their own heroism, have even more need of assistance from the nations fighting with them.

If wea ssemble all these elements they would constitute a world whose unlimitable possibilities stagger the imagination. Let them get together, supply the deficiencies of each where they appear, organize themselves and then the German power will be no more.

TAMMANY TICKET IS HEADED BY JUDGE SWANN

New York.—Following a series of conferences with Assembly district leaders and other interested democrats, Charles F. Murphy, leader of Tammany, yesterday practically determined the ticket which the democratic organization will support at the primaries on September 28. Information from the best sources obtainable was to the effect that Judge Edward Swann would head the ticket as the nominee for District Attorney and that "Big Bill' Edwards, formerly Street Cleaning Commissioner, would be the nominee for Sheriff.

The Tammany slate looks today as follows:

For District Attorney—Judge Edward Swann, of the Court of General Sessions.

For Sheriff—William H. Edwards, formerly Street Cleaning Commissioner.

For Justices of the Supreme Court—Justices John Proctor Clarke, Samuel Greenbaum, Clarence A. Shearn, and Francis B. Delehanty, to succeer themselves. No selection yet for fifth nomination and a Bronx democrat for the sixth.

For Judge of the City Court — Judge Lorenz Zeller.

For uJstice of the Municipal Court, Eighth district—John F. Cowan.

For Justice of the Municipal Court, Ninth district—Not yet selected.

NEW YORK PAYS OFF BIG DEBT TODAY

New York.—Today New York City will redeem $57,000,000 one-year 6 per cent notes, the largest redemption ever executed at one time.

Last Summer with the English premium, in excess of $5 compared with abnormal rate of $4.866, the city was confronted with having to meet huge maturing obligations owned in England and France.

Previously the Comptroller thought he had made a brilliant financial stroke by borrowing abroad where money rates were a shade lower than here. But he had figured without the possibility of a war which entailed tremendous selling here by foreigners of American securities owned. This liquidation piled up large credits here in favor of England and France.

To overcome this unanticipated situation, Comptroller Prendergast had to enlist the aid of local bankers. They responded by agreeing to take $100,000,000 of one, two and three-year notes to be issued by the city; but the securities bore 6 per cent interest.

The city today will pay off the one-year notes, $50,000,000 of which held by 3,000 individuals and institutions.

I. C. C. TO HAVE CONTROL OF CARRIER SECURITIES

Washington, Sept. 1.—Legislation to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority over the issue of stocks and bonds of common carriers, which failed at the last session, will be put through at the coming session of Congress as an administration measure. The President, it was said today, promised this to party leaders.

Chairman Newlands, of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, made a determined fight for this bill last year, but in the press of other matters it was permitted to die. He charged then that the watering of railroad stocks would never be prevented until some government body was given absolute control over the issue, as provided in his bill.

Administrationl eaders now say the proposed legislation is to be given a preferred place on thec alendar of both Houses.

Elihu Root, Statesman

Elihu Root is the dominating figure in the constitutional convention, just as he was in the United States Senate when he was a member of that body, and just as he was in the Cabinet of tion is that in his case brilliancy of intion is that in his case brillancy of intellect is combined with incorruptible patriotism and honesty of purpose. Men respect him for his ability, but they respect him also for his strong sense of duty and high ideals.

He said in the constitutional convention Monday, in what was perhaps the most remarkable and eloquent of the series of speeches which have swayed the convention in critical moments in its deliberations:

> There is a plain old house in the hills of Oneida, overlooking the valley of the Mohawk, where truth and honor dwelt in my youth. When I go back, as I am about to go, to spend my declining years. I mean to go with the feeling that I can say I have not failed to speak and to act in accordance with thel essons that I learned there from the God of my fathers. God grant that this opportunity for service to our country and our state may not be neglected by any of the men for whom I feel so deep friendship in this convention.

Mr. Root has on previous occasions expressed a determination to make his services in thec onstitutional convention the crowning work of his public career, and he has labored to that end with a courage, fidelity, and industry that a man gives only when all the energies of his nature are bent on achieving a certain end. He has for years enjoyed the reputation of being the leading lawyer in the United States, but he never served a private client with the energy, enthusiasm and determination with which he is serving the people of the state of New York at this time.

The remarkable work that Mr. Root is doing at Albany has attracted nationwide attention, and when it is completed will undoubtedly be followed by further calls on his ability and patriotism. To see his name at the head of the Republican ticket in the next presidential campaign would give immense satisfaction to thousands of thoughtful voters outside the ranks of his own party, as well as to the great mass of Republicans.—Rochester Express.

CONSTANTINOPLE BRIDGE DAMAGED BY SUBMARINE

London, Sept. 1.—A British submarine has shelled and partly wrecked the famous Galata Bridge, across the Golden Horn between Constantinople and the suburb of Galata, according to an Athens despatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company.

The despatch adds that the appearance of the submarine caused a panic along thew ater front, as well it might considering that the feat would be equivalent to blowing up Westminister Bridge or the Brooklyn Bridge by a hostile vessel appearing without warning when the enemy was supposed to be miles away.

NEWSPAPER ASKS FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS TO LOAN

Berlin, Tuesday, via London, Sept. 1—The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung today prints an appeal for subscriptions to the third German war loan. It is understood that the subscriptions will be opened within two or three weeks and will be at 99, as compared with 98½ when the March loan was raised.

ALL DANGER OF COAL STRIKE NOW ENDED

London, Sept. 1.—Danger of another coal strike that would tie up the Welsh fields and perhaps prove a serious obstacle to the efficient execution of Britain's measures was removed yesterday when agreement was reached on most of the points in dispute between the owners and miners.

The chief concessionm ade by the operators was an agreement to extend to the engineers and other surface workers the right to share in the bonus granted to the miners. The exclusion of the surface workers was the principal cause of dissatisfaction.

ITALIANS CAPTURE MOUNTAIN STRONGHOLD

Paris, Sept. 1.—A strong Italian column moving up from Vicenza and Bassano toward Rovereto stormed Monte Maronia yesterday and in the fact of a concentrated fire from Austrian guns of all calibres captured the summit of them ountain.

Aided by a supporting railway, which runsf rom Vicenza up the valley as far as Cagallo the Italians have concentrated a largef orce near Arsiero, a few miles further on, with which to press their attack on Rovereto and the Adige valley. These troops, as is the case with all the contingents operating on the Tyrol and Carnia front, are under the necessity of clearing not only the valley of hostile forces, but of driving the Austrian garrisons from all the mountain summits on each side, every one of which has been turned into a veritable fotress. The task means mountaineering of the most spectacular kind, since in addition to all the perils of ascents over ice and snow, up precipitous cliffs and across glacial crevices, the Alpini, to whom are assigned the work, make their advances against men equally skilled in mountain fighting and well equipped with arms and ammunition.

Ft. Stanwix Employe Admits Early Morning Working Hours

Superintendent Admits Illegal Employment of Woman, Sustaining Action In Claim That Necessity Demands More Than 12 Hours

After a four-hour session, which was devoted to the examination of many jurors, and the witnesses in the case, Judge Wilson adjourned the City Court at 1 o'clock today in the case of the State Labor Department vs. the Fort Stanwix Canning Company of this city, until 2 o'clock this afternoon, in order that the jurors might go to their dinners. Counsel for both sides were prepared to sum up when the adjournment came, but as Howard C. Wiggins, of Rome, counsel for the company, intimated that his arguments would consume the better part of an hour, an adjournment was taken.

The case this morning is one of the two violations charged by the State Labor Department involving the employment of women in the local factory after the hours of 10 p. m. at night and before 6 a. m. in the morning, as prescribed by section 93 of the Labor Law. The case on trial this morning charges the company with employing Mrs. Hattie Loungley, of 172 West Fourth st., this city, at 1 o'clock on the morning of July 23 last.

Edward Quigley, of New York, counsel for the state, appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Wiggins and Claude E. Guile of this city represented the canning company. Before any jurors were impanneled Mr. Quigley and Mr. Wiggins had a lengthy argument over the points of law involved in the case.

Approves of Long Hours

George Barnes was the first juror challenged by either side. When he told Mr. Quigley that he believed people should be allowed to work and should be employed whenever there was work, whether it was against the law or not, he was promptly excused. James Wilson was challenged but excused by Judge Wilson when he said he certainly would bring in a "verdict of guilty against that sweat-shop over the river where they employed people 20 hours out of 24, if the evidence proved them guilty." John O'Brien was excused when he said he would vote not to convict even though the canning company was proven violators of the law. Thomas Nelles was also exceused when he said he did not feel that he could consider a question of law. The jurors finally selected were: Charles A. Wilbur, Thomas Goff, John Mahaney, Jed B. Davis, Henry Jardine and Patrick Lynch. In almost every instance the juror told Mr. Quigley he would not hesitate to bring in a verdict of guilty if the offense was proven a violation of the law; and to a question proposed by

Mr. Wiggins, said he would not hesitate to bring in a verdict of not guilty if it was proven by the canning company that the inalienable rights under the Constitution were affected by the law, and that the law prevented an adult from contracting for labor whenever he so willed.

Mr. Quigley read section 93 of the Labor Law to the jury, and then called Frank S. Nast, State Inspector of Factories, upon whose information the canning company is charged with a misdemeanor. Mr. Nash testified that he had been a factory inspector for several years and had been assigned to the inspection of four factories in this section this summer during the canning season. On the night of July 23, Mr. Nash said, he had checked out the employes at the canning factory about 1 o'clock in the morning and found that Mrs. Hattie Loungley had been employed there at that time, a direct violation of the law. He also said he had conversed with Lester O. Todd, Superintendent of the canning company, about the employment of women at night and had given Mr. Todd several notices from the State Department charging violations. He said Mr. Todd admitted the illegality of employing women at that hour of the night. Mr. Wiggins interposed at this point to ask Mr. Nash if he wished to swear that Hattie Loungley was employed at 1 o'clock on the night in question and when Mr. Nash replied that he had already done that in his affidavit Mr. Wiggins said; "We will prove that Mrs. Loungley was not in the city on that date."

Mrs. Loungley Admits Presence in City

Shortly before Mrs. Loungley was called to the stand by Mr. Wiggins, after Mr. Quigley had rested for the state, the court took a short recess to watch the circus parade.

Mrs. Loungley said she had left the city for a short time, but that she left on July 5 and stayed in Antwerp ouly four days, thereby refuting Mr. Wiggins' assertion that she was not in the city on July 23. Mr. Wiggins said he had been misinformed by Mr. Todd, who told him that Mrs. Loungley had told him (Mr. Todd) that she was out of the city the week of July 23. Mrs. Loungley remembered the night of July 23, and said Mr. Nash had checked one employe at 12:45 a. m.

Under cross-exeamination by Mr. Quigley, Mrs. Loungley, who is a comely, robust woman, said she felt no ill-effects from night work and was perfectly willing to work at night whenever she was given the opportunity. She said she averaged about $6 a week and one week she made $6.40. She said the company paid her ten cents per hour. She admitted knowing that night work was a violation of the law, but added that no employe or representative of the company refused to allow her to work at night.

Mr. Todd Testifies

Lester O. Todd, superintendent of the local factory for the past six years, was called to the stand by Mr. Wiggins. Mr. Todd explained that the rush season at the canning factory was of short duration, but during that season the produce must be handled quickly or it depreciates in value very rapidly and becomes worthless. From memoranda in his possession Mr. Todd stated that 117 loads

BOARD'S RIGHT TO GIVE PERMIT IS DISPUTED BY JUDGE, IS THE BELIEF

It became evident today that the case of the Granby Paper Company vs. the City of Fulton will not be the only litigation growing out of the dispute over the possession of Schenck st., but it is probable that two other property owners in that vicinity will be involved.

I. Alderman, who operates an iron warehouse in West 2nd st., has brought an action in the Supreme Court against P. F. Crahan, who conducts a coal business in Schenck st., claiming that the erectionofa coal storage shed in Schenck st. by Mr. Crahan will seriously depreciate the value of his property. Mr. Alderman has applied to Judge Coville for an injunction restraining Mr. Crahan from completing the erection of his shed and petitioning an order for its removal.

Mr. Crahan applied for a permit from the Board of Public Works to erect a coal shed in Schenck st. and the permit was granted. The permit includes a clause which allows the board to dispossess Mr. Crahan on 60 days' notice. The board was fully within its rights in issuing the permit, Mr. Crahan's attorneys claim.

Shortly after work was begun on the shed, Mr. Alderman applied for an injunction, claiming that the erection of the shed would seriously interfere with entrance to his property in Second st. and would impair the value of the property for the reason that the shed would prevent the loading of freight near the Alderman warehouse, and would compel Mr. Alderman to carry his freight further down the switch before putting it on the cars.

While Judge Coville has rendered no decision as yet, he has intimated that he will hold in favor of the plaintiff on the contention that the Board of Public Works has no right to issue a permit for a building on the street.

Mr. [illegible]n's attorneys say they will start an action against Mr. Al[illegible] for occupancy on the roadway of Second st. if the decision [illegible]ge Coville removes the Crahan coalshed from the street. [illegible] Hillick, attorney for Mr. Crahan, claims the board has lega[illegible] to issue a permit for a building, and also claims that Mr. Al[illegible] building is on the public thoroughfare.

BUSINESS MEN TO STUDY SALESMANSHIP UNDER GREAT EFFICIENCY MAN

A group of the younger business men of the city gathered at the office of the Chamber of Commerce last night and discussed plans for conducting a course on "Salesmanship and Business Efficiency." The text-book selected was the new edition of the book published by J. S. Knox, who appeared recently on the Chautauqua circuit here in Fulton. The class was organized last night and it was decided to hold regular meetings on Wednesday evenings at 8 o'clock in the office of the Chamber. At each one of these meetings one of the lessons in the course will be taken up and studied. Some member of the class will lead the discussion, and there will be ample opportunity for everyone to take part. The cost of the full course of 32 lessons and the text-book will be $7.00, provided that all the orders are forwarded to the Knox school at the same time, after that, the price will naturally be higher.

As one man stated last night, the text-book itself is worth more than $7.00. He has already ordered a set for himself and has begun the study of the course. When it is remembered that many of the courses in salesmanship cost from $40 to $80 a piece, it is easy to see the value of co-operation in this respect. The organizers of the class who are working in co-operation with the retail trade division of the Chamber last night decided to extend an invitation to join to all interested men and women in the city. If a sufficient number of the ladies apply for membership in the class, it is proposed to organize a separate section. During fall and winter demonstration sales in various lines will be arranged for and at these times it is quite likely tha the two sections will be combined.

This course in salesmanship has been undertaken in the hope that the students in the course may benefit by it in time to increase their efficiency before the Christmas shopping season begins. The course as outlined is based upon the actual business experience of a man who made good in a very remarkable way as a salesman and salesmanager before he undertook the work of an educator in salesmanship. While some of it is theoretical, it is theory based on actual practical experience and not worked out by a dreamer who could not make good in busines.

It is expected that a good many of the keen young men and women in the city will take advantage of this opportunity to increase their own business efficiency. If they do make use of the offer, it is more than likely that the retail merchants of the city will find that the school has been of actual money value to them in their business.

Wiltsie Refuses to Resign "Under Fire," Is Reported

Administration Would Sacrifice Newest Commissioner to Save Messrs. Stevenson and Garrett, Both of Whom Made Threats

The First st. paving fight took on a new phase today when it became known that Commissioner A. W. Wiltsie of the Board of Public Works, had been asked to resign from the board by Mayor F. E. Fox, following a short conference Tuesday afternoon. When called on the telephone at his home today Mayor Fox told a Times reporter the report was true; that he had asked Commissioner Wiltsie to resign and that the commissioner had told him he would offer his resignation at once.

Fred A. Gage said today that Mr. Wiltsie told him he had been called upon by the Mayor Tuesday afternoon and that the Mayor had asked for his resignation. Mr. Wiltsie told Mayor Fox he would not resign under fire, according to Mr. Gage. Mr. Wiltsie was neither at his home nor his office at noon today and his version of the interview could not be learned.

At noon today Mayor Fox said, "Yes—I did have an interview with Mr. Wiltsie and I asked him to resign from the board, so that all this dissension and bickering on the board may cease. The other members of the board have intimated that they will resign if Mr. Wiltsie does not, as they see in the [illegible] Fred A. Gage and George E. Mason from the hospital and city planning boards, a deliberate attempt to get control of the Board of Public Works on the question of the paving of First st. I asked Mr. Wiltsie to resign so that there might be harmony on the board.

Mayor Chagrinned

"Mr. Wiltsie voted to pave First st. 38 feet wide when the plan was first proposed. If he did not believe the street should be wider, he should have informed himself on the question before he voted to pave it. Now he holds with Messrs. Gage and Mason that the street should not be widened, and the other members of the board feel these three men will combine to hold up this improvement and work to prevent any action of the board they do not like.

"Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Garrett have intimated they will resign if Mr. Wiltsie does not. They are tired of this continual bickering and feel, as long as the improvement is for the best interests of the city at large, and inasmuch as the board voted unanimously to pave the street 38 feet wide, it should be done. I told Mr. Wiltsie of Mr. Stevenson's and Mr. Garrett's ideas on the subject and he told me he would resign, in order that some one could be appointed who would work in harmony with the other members of the board."

"You have not received Mr. Wiltsie's written resignation then?" the Mayor was asked.

Nobody in View

"No, I have not," he replied. Mayor Fox also said he had given no thought to the selection of another commissioner in the event that Commissioner Wiltsie does resign.

Mr. Gage insisted at noon today that Mr. Wiltsie had not given the Mayor to understand he would resign. "On the contrary," said Mr. Gage emphatically, "Mr. Wiltsie told the Mayor he would not resign under fire."

Commissioner Wiltsie and President Stevenson have been at odds for some time, although there has been no open [illegible] brought up for advertising, although he had voted for a 38 foot roadway when the board first decided to pave the street. Mr. Wiltsie claimed Mr. Stevenson told him the property owners did not object to the plan, and he therefore voted in the affirmative on the paving.

It is well known that Messrs. Stevenson and Garrett are opposed to the appointment of Messrs. Gage and Mason to serve on the Paving Board. It seems likely that their appointment will be ratified at the next meeting, as the property owners appoint their representatives by petitiona nd Messrs. Gage and Mason have secured the largest number of signers. With Mr. Wiltsie in accord with Mr. Gage and Mr. Mason, the controlling power in the board would be lodged in the hands of those who wish to oppose the widening plan.

Root's Speech

That toward the twilight of his years Mr. Root is in the full moon of his intellectual force is news to no one. But his speech and his whole course in the convention, of which he is the most powerful member, testify to an ability most unusual among men of ripe age, thep ower of contemporary in feeling with the younger generation, of taking the form and pressure of present time, of remaking their stock of ideas, of casting aside the political habits of thought, the prepossessions of a lifetime. Age may or may not bring wisdom. It usually brings an invincible conservatism, an unshakable attachment to old ways, distrust of innovations. The new notions of the new generation do not reach it. "It has served my time" is a sufficient defense of what the younger men find an abuse, an evil. * * *

Mr. Root was an "organization Republican." He was of his time. Now he is of this time. The strut and curl of Conkling, his political suicide and that of "Me Too," the political recovery and long rule of that Easy Boss, about whhose relations with himself Mr. Roosevelt has formed so curious a legend; "I am a Democrat" Hill, Cornell and the "Young Scratchers," Stalwart and Half Breed, have passed. What remains is the Mugwump, by whatever name now surviving, the passion for honest, responsible, representative government.—New York Times.

Teaching Children Thrift

The resolution introduced by Commissioner Burrows, and passed by the Board of Education providing for the adoption in the public schools of Rochester of the school savings ban! plan expresses the object clearly, and in a very few words, as "a means of developing in the lives of our school children those habits of thrift which are so essential to personal character and to good citizenship."

The plan about to be introduced here has been tried in other cities with good results. The idea is to teach children to save their pennies and nickels instead of squandering them at the first store they pass. Experience has shown that few children have any realization of the rapidity with which pennies, nickels and dimes mount into dollars when saved, and the scheme of school savings banks serves as an object lesson whose effects are lasting.

The details, as worked out by the Board of Education, provide that the children shall turn over their accumulated savings to their teachers once a week, receiving credit therefor in a little deposit book. As soon as an individed deposit reaches $3 a bank pass book will be issued to the depositor and the account will begin to draw interest. Lack of thrift has been called one of the greatest defects in American character. Extravagance andw aste are much more common than frugality. It is to be hoped that practical lessons in saving will have some effect in counteracting national weaknesses.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

CHEMISTS PLAN HUGE DYE INDUSTRY IN U. S.

New York.—About twelve manufacturing chemists called upon Dr. Norton, representing the Department of Commerce, yesterday relative to the creation of a huge dyestuff industry in this country.

Dr. Norton said the men he saw represented in the aggregate chemical interests whose businesses are capitalized at $75,000,000. Some, Dr. Norton added, represented the coal tar enterprises.

Dr. Norton also spoke at length with a person said to be one of the foremost men in the manufacture of high explosives and onelyikely to be of great value in developing the dyestuffs industry in America.

THOSE GOOD MEN WHO TRIED TO DO IT

Now one of the Flopsy Bunnies who has been a member of Our Form of Government, which can't be worse, reminds us of Benjamin, the little fellow who with hih brothers and sisters had simply stuffed lettuce until they were overcome. Benjamin had not exhibited quite as much piggishness as the others. Before going to sleep he was sufficiently wide awake to put a paper bag over his head to keep off the flies. The little Flopsy Bunnies slept delightfully in the warm sun. From the lawn beyond the garden came the distant clacketty sound of the municipal mowing machine. The municipal mowing machine was in the hands of the manager who was a very good man in his way, but he couldn't make the machine work, because of the number of flies that buzzed about his ears. Each fly had its designation. There was "Complexity," an awfully annoying fly to the manager who wanted things his very own way; then came "Obscurity," the fly that always wanted star chamber sessions, so that the public might be prevented from getting wise to what was going on in municipal affairs; then came "IRRESPONSIBILITY," the hardest of all flies to catch and hold, and finally, the fly named "INEFFICIENCY." This last named fly always bobbed up at the wrong time in the municipal machine. It would persistently show itself just when the manager of the mowing machine would have things running smoothly for the sake of bolstering up a weak old cause. This particular day "INEFFICIENCY" bobbed across the paper bag and awakened Benjamin Bunny who was trying to do some collective thinking while dozing under the paper bag that had been bought and paid for by the taxpayers. "INEFFICIENCY," after waking Benjamin Bunny made a dive for the manager of the municipal machine, and what did the pesky fly find. Why, he found the alleged powerful manager of the municipal mowing machine trying to push his machine against some very stout looking obstacles that stood on the taxpayers' lawn. Those obstacles, too, had names, given them by the good members of the Flopsy Bunny family. First, there was "Simplicity," who wanted the municipal mowing machine run like a business; second, there was "PUBLICITY," who always objected to the municipal star chamber sessions, wanting the public to know all there was to know about the running gears of the mowing machine; third, there was "RESPONSIBILITY," an obstacle that was hard for the manager of the municipal mowing machine to overcome, because it was his strong forte to get by hook or crook from under any real responsibility and shift the blame on weaker shoulders; and last but not least he found the taxpayers had placed before the mower the hardest obstacle for him to overcome. He was forced to buck against "EFFICIENCY." This obstacle was simply immovable. He could make no headway against it and he was at a loss to know what to do, or which way to turn. For the first time in his career as manager of the municipal mowing machine he had a problem to solve. The owners of the mowing machine, the taxpayers, wanted to know how he hoped to prevent the practice of inefficient methods in the conduct of the municipal machine; how he could prevent the piggishness exhibited by Benjamin's brothers and sisters who had eaten to the fullest extent of the lettuce.

The manager of the municipal mowing machine tried his best to budge the obstacles set up by the good members of the Bunny family. Other managers had tried to do the same thing and all of them failed. They met with "Complexity," "Obscurity," "Irresponsibility," and "Inefficiency." Too much for the mowing machine.

YOU AND THE BOSS

It doesn't make any particular difference what you do—you can do it better.

The reason we plod along in the same old rut is because we're satisfied; we believe we are good.

There was once a time when we could hear Opportunity before she got as far as the door—no need to knock! But, after a few successful days, we begin to believe we're a great deal more successful than ever we expected to be. Opportunity would have to kick our shins to become noticed.

The boss doesn't believe in being satisfied; he never was satisfied—and that's why they made him boss. Being a boss, he isn't going to be satisfied with your smugness.

Whenever your work becomes a habit, is void of new discovery, and has resolved into drudgery, it is because you are satisfied you've got about all you can get from (and to) the job. The boss, observing this, as all bosses do, is going to be particularly dissatisfied; this may lead to an argument wherein the boss has the better of it.

Lean hard against your abilities; be dissatisfied with yourself; beat the boss to a piece of head-work, and, if he's the kind of a boss we suspect him to be, he will begin to be more satisfied with you.

The more satisfied the boss is, the more dissatisfied you are regarding your productiveness, the better satisfied the whole concern is going to be.

But keep your dissatisfaction to yourself—that's your secret. When the boss is satisfied you'll understand he has discovered your secret. About this time the word ANTICIPATION will take on a new meaning to you—and the boss.—By E. K. J.

Temptation Shows Worth of Person

By Rev. Preston Bradley, Pastor of Wilson Avenue People's Church, Chicago.

It is impossible for us to understand the moral development of a man without some knowledge of the temptations that have crossed his path. In analyzing those factors which have entered into the moral success of a man we find that the part his temptations have played is the leading role in his drama of life.

The highest example that we have of the moral life is found in the character of Jesus. His biographers have portrayed the character and scope of his temptations. There was nothing startling or unique in the temptations of Jesus. They came at a time in his life when they were most severe and at a time when he was the weakest. They were real tests of his power. They revealed his humanity. Without temptation in his own life he could have had no sympathetic attitude for humankind.

The man whose life is spent in ease and refinement can never appreciate the position of the man who is having a terrific struggle.

The man whose heart has never been torn by a great grief can never understand the value or depth of his own happiness.

The man whose whole moral nature has not been swept by some mighty surge of a great temptation can never feel the moral security of one who fought and won.

Great and terrific temptations are necessary to strong and powerful lives.

Cannon That Modernized Japan

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

BUSINESS is no longer a man to man contact, in which the seller and the buyer establish a personal bond, any more than battle is a hand-to-hand grapple wherein bone and muscle and sinew decide the outcome. Trade as well as war has changed aspect—both are now fought at long range.

Just as a present-day army of heroes would have no opportunity to display the individual valor of its members, just so a merchant who counts upon his direct acquaintanceship for success, is a relic of the past—a business dodo.

Japan changed her policy of exclusion to foreigners, after a fleet of warships battered down the Satsuma fortifications. The Samurai, who had hitherto considered their blades and bows efficient, discovered that one cannon was mightier than all the swords in creation—if they could not get near enough to use them. Japan profited by the lesson. She did not wait until further ramparts were pounded to pieces but was satisfied with her one experience and proceeded to modernize her methods.

The merchant who doesn't advertise is pretty much in the same position as that in which Japan stood when her eyes were opened to the fact that times had changed. The long range publicity of a competitor will as surely destroy his business as the cannon of the foreigners crumbled the walls of Satsuma. Unless you take the lesson to heart, unless you realize the importance of advertising, not only as a means of extending your business but for defending it as well, you must be prepared to face the consequences of a folly as great as that of a duelist who expects to survive in a contest in which his adversary bears a sword twice the length of his own.

Don't think that it's too late to begin because there are so many stores which have had the advantage of years of cumulative advertising. The town is growing. It will grow even more next year. It needs increased trading facilities just as it's hungry for new neighborhoods.

Newspaper advertising has reduced the value of being locally prominent, and five cent street car fares have cut out the advantage of being "around the corner." A store five miles away, can reach through the columns of the newspaper and draw your next door neighbor to its aisles, while you sit by and see the people on your own block enticed away, without your being able to retaliate or secure new customers to take their place.

It is not a question of your ability to stand the cost of advertising but of being able to survive without it. The thing you have to consider is not only an extension of your business but of holding what you already have.

Advertising is an investment, the cost of which is in the same proportion to its returns as seeds are to the harvest. And it is just as preposterous for you to consider publicity as an expense, as it would be for a farmer to hesitate over purchasing a fertilizer, if he discovered that he could profitably increase his crops by employing it.

COUNTERFEIT $2 BILLS ARE FLOATING AROUND

Secret service officers of the Treasury Department have called public attention to new counterfeits. One is a $5 bank note on the First National Bank of Omaha, and the other is a counterfeit of a $2 certificate. They have beenc irculated in quite large numbers in various parts of the country.

Both notes have marked differences from genuineb ills and can easily be told. The $5 note is described as a very poor counterfeit and on the smaller bill several important features are left off.

W. H. Moran, acting chiefo f the United States Secret Service has sent out the following description:

"Five dollar national bank note—On the First National Bank of Omaha, Ill., check letter 'A'; series of 1902-3; J. C. Napier, Register of the Treasury; Lee McClung, Treasurer of the United States; portrait of Benjamin Harrison; charter number, 10291; bank number, 855; Treasury number, E35496B. Printed from crudely etched plates on two pieces of paper, between which silk threads have been disturbuted. It is very poor.

"Two dollar silver certificate — Series of 1899. Appears to be from wood cut plates and is so poor as to be unworthy of detail description. Bears noc heck letter and Register of the Treasury' and "Treasurer of the United States' are omitted."

VICTORY FOR SHORT BALLOT PREDICTED TOMORROW

Albany, Sept. 2.—Majority Leader G. W. Wickersham said this morning that the short ballot and departmental reorganization proposals before the constitutional convention will be voted on finally tomorrow. Only slight changes in the draft as finally submitted were made by thec onvention before advancing it to theo rder of final passage. The most important of these was an amendment which would give the governor power to name the secretary of charities, tax commission and the commissioners of accounts, health and agriculture without the consent of the Senate.

County Fair Time

That long-cherished American institution, the season of county fairs, is near at hand. It is gratifying to note, in this association, that preparations are well advanced to make the Erie County Fair, beginning at Hamburg the 14th of September, a success which shall compare with any of its predecessors, and have not a little to spare besides.

There is no usage which conduces more strongly to healthy comradeship to competition unmarred by jealousy, to co-operation in the spirit of true fraternity, to social uplift and mental and moral well-being of communities, than this custom of holding county fairs.

Much that is interesting and instructive is seen at these fairs, and in addition to that there is a homeiness of sentiment, a renewal of friendships a perpetuation of the neighborliness which is one of the most valuable traditions of American life, of incalculable worth to localities and the nation.—Buffalo Times.

DOINGS OF THE VAN LOONS — No wonder Father couldn't remember

HOME TOWN HELPS

FARMERS MAKE HOMES UGLY

Beautiful Scenes Are All Too Frequently Spoiled by Lack of Building Plans.

To reach the home of a prosperous farmer in a corn belt community one passes back from the road between cornfields for 80 rods. The approach to the house is through the cowlot. The woodpile is also there, near the front gate. From the parlor window one looks out over the hoglot toward the barn. To get a view of grassland, trees and real scenery one must go to the kitchen door, which opens toward the rolling pasture and the wood beyond. But even there one must look over the array of chicken coops close by the house.

If this house had been near the road it could have overlooked a wide expanse of beautiful prairie-flanked woods, says the Breeder's Gazette. Another home in that section is beautifully placed about 100 yards back from the highway on a broad knoll overlooking a 60-acre sparsely timbered hill pasture lying across the road. But unappreciative of the glorious natural view, the builder of that homestead put the horsebarn to the left and the cowbarn to the right of the house and both nearer the road than the house.

We are told by landscape gardeners that it is well to have the view from the home framed in, but old barns are not good picture framing material. Trees and shrubs are better. There is an evident lack of plan to blame for most of these ugly farm homesteads. Location and natural scenery are sometimes very attractive, but the effect is spoiled by poor arrangement of buildings and enclosures. Perhaps some farmers do not pay enough attention to the beauties about them. Certainly there are great differences in farmsteads.

On other farms the front of the house is the first thing seen from the road, and it is set about by trees in such a way as to frame a complete picture of it. Shrubs and trees are placed so as to leave desirable views as one looks from the porch. All blend with lawn and surroundings into one harmonious living picture. Barns and stock lots, chickens and vegetable garden are grouped back of the house. To each side of the house, flanking the road, are pastures or meadows of alfalfa or small grain. This distant view is unobstructed. The family enjoys, and to that extent owns, all it can see. There is more inspiration in a view of distant fields, woods and homesteads than in the contemplation of nearby pigpens and cowlots.

ATTRACTIVE DOORWAY

A Community's Job.

It is little use for the local editor to waste his lungs and strain his spine on trying to boom a town when the citizens all stand around with their hands in their pockets and indifferently wait for something to turn up. If the capitalists or business men do not put their shoulders to the wheel and do a little boosting it is useless for the editor to try and boom things. He can write "boom" articles until he gets bald headed, but if the citizens themselves do not take hold and push the town will forever stick in the mud. Of what use is it for the local paper to suggest improvements and new enterprises if the suggestions are never acted upon? One man cannot boom a town. It required the concerted action of the citizens. When one man shoulders a town and attempts to carry it there are always a lot of cranky kickers ready to jump on top of the load.—Valley Times.

WHAT A MAN READS.

It Is a Big Factor in Determining His Course of Life.

A certain low form of aquatic animal life anchors itself to a rock and feeds on whatever the current brings. The average man feeds his mind in much the same way. He falls into line for current amusements. He reads only current literature. He listens to what happens to go by. He makes but little systematic attempt to shut out the unfit or to put himself in line for the fit.

The result is a defective grade of human life that rarely elevates society and often degrades it. If a man would make the most of himself, and that is manifestly the supreme purpose for which he was put into the world, it is worth his while to do his daily work where unclean things, mental and physical, are not made common.

It makes a good deal of difference in the worth of the man today as to whether his reading last night was "Hamlet" and "Isaiah" or "The Other Man's Wife," whether he went to the art institute or the burlesque show. An ancient teacher of well balanced mind gave this direction to his disciples as to the topics to be selected for deliberate thought:

"Finally, my brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things."

To think on these things one must see and hear these things. To see and hear these things one must make an effort to do so.—Minneapolis Journal.

Sunlight and Vegetation.

The early rays of the sun exercise a more powerful effect in promoting rapid vegetation than the sun's light during the later hours of the day. The active little chlorophyll grains work faster and better in elaborating food for the plant under the action of the blue and yellow rays of the early morning than under the later violet and blue rays. Practical gardeners should make use of this fact by growing early produce as far as possible in a position where the plants will get the full benefit of the morning sun.—London Mail.

NOTES OF LABOR.

D. F. Lewis of Salt Lake City has been re-elected president of the Utah State Federation of Labor.

Wages at the rate of a half penny, or one cent an hour, are paid to many women workers in the Belfast linen factories.

Since 1903, from the beginning of its organization, the National Women's Trade Union League of America has stood for full citizenship for women.

The International Machinists' union has started a campaign to strengthen the organization that has been carried into every one of the New England states.

It has been decided to hold all future conventions of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in the headquarters building of the organization in Cleveland.

ERA OF HIGH WAGES WILL FOLLOW WAR

Better Pay In Europe Will Restrict Immigration.

Economical and industrial conditions abroad, after the war, the enforcement of the laws of many European countries forbidding emigration, and the prohibition in our laws against the admission of physical incompetents to the United States, are factors which, in the opinion of Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson, will result in the greatest reduction in immigration in decades.

The probabilities are, in the opinion of the secretary, that workmen will command higher wages and more respect from employers, and that foreign governments, because of the almost helpless condition in which the warring countries will find themselves—fields devastated, bridges and factories destroyed and industry at a standstill—will call for labor to restore and replenish.

The great demand for labor abroad, compelling the payment of higher wages than in years, and the lessening of the influx of laborers from foreign countries, will have the effect not only of increasing the activity in the United States, but of increasing wage scales.

Such is the opinion of the head of the United States labor department, who bases this deduction on what happened both at home and abroad after the Franco-Prussian war.

"I do not look for a great rush in foreign immigration for several physical and psychological reasons," said Secretary Wilson.

"First.—Men are likely to have an unusually strong attachment for those places where they endured hardship and suffered. It seldom is the case that there has been a great immigration from countries that have been at war after the conflict except where they have been driven out.

"Second.—The labor situation abroad will offer so much to the laboring man as to make him satisfied with his lot at home. There will be the work of restoration in all countries, the greatest field of activity the world has ever seen. Workmen will be more respected and will command consideration.

"Third.—Immigration will be restricted by our laws. Millions of men who have been maimed or injured or contracted chronic illness as the result of the war will reduce the number of people available for admission to this country. The physically defective cannot be admitted, and this also will keep out their families and relatives, as the families will have no means of support and cannot come here for fear they will become paupers."

CALLS LAWSON INNOCENT.

Sentenced to Prison For Life Because He Was a Union Man, Gompers Says.

John Lawson has been found guilty of being an officer of organized labor and sentenced to a living death in connection with the death of a man of whose death he knew nothing. Why? Because somebody wants to get John Lawson out of the way. It is a familiar trick of hostile employers to undermine unionism by getting the leaders out of the way by allurement, discharge or jail—some way, any way. The coal barons of Colorado have been dominated by a man who would sacrifice all his investments in Colorado rather than recognize the new industrial situation which assures wage earners a voice in determining conditions under which they work. In relentless pursuance of this policy John Lawson became a marked man.—Samuel Gompers.

Liability For Accident.

The federal employers' liability law will not prevent the applicability of the New Jersey workmen's compensation act in a suit for contract labor entered into in New Jersey even though the accident happened in Pennsylvania. This was the decision of the supreme court sitting at Trenton in the compensation suit of George A. Rounsaville of Phillipsburg against the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey. Rounsaville was injured while working as a brakeman in Pennsylvania. The trial court held the federal liability law prevented recovering damages under the New Jersey statute. The supreme court took a different view and reversed the trial judge's ruling.

Free Speech Stilled.

Theodore Schroeder, attorney for the Free Speech league, testifying before the industrial relations commission declared the courts had lost sight of "free speech" in its historical sense.

"A study of conditions throughout the world has shown me that we have more penalized opinions in this country today than any other country has had since the world began. By that I mean we have less conceded freedom of speech than any other country."

To Dedicate Labor Temple.

Trade unionists of Rochester, N. Y., are arranging to dedicate their labor temple on next Labor day. The structure is four stories and basement, with a frontage of sixty-seven feet and a depth of 150 feet. Assembly rooms, offices, banquet hall and an auditorium that will seat a thousand are features of this up to date home for Rochester's workers.

PULL TOGETHER.

With all the responsibilities devolving upon us, to be of service to our fellow workers we should not only organize the yet unorganized, inculcate the spirit of unity, fraternity and federation, but we should work to that one end which shall make our organized labor movement the most effective to advance the interests of the toiling masses of our country and to bring encouragement and hope, light and success into the lives of those dependent upon them.—American Federationist.

STRONG UNIONS URGED.

Organized Labor Should Strive to Build Up Power.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in an address before the delegates to the International Fur Workers' union, in recent session at New York city, said in part:

"It's all right to tell us about the streets of gold and the beautiful things in the sweet by and by, but we want some of those things in the bitter now and now."

The speaker exhorted the members to stand by and to improve their union, not only in time of industrial strife, but continually.

"I have seen unions of fur workers and other unions come and go," he said. "What would you think of an army unprepared to meet the onslaught of its enemies? An army dismembered and at the mercy of a powerful foe is comparable to the plight in which I have seen unions that were not properly organized. In addition to enthusiasm you must have a system of self imposed discipline to lend strength to your organized efforts. Be prepared to present a solid phalanx to forces opposing you. Yours is an organization not for a year, or a decade, or a century, but for all time. And the struggles of labor in our time will be even more important to the historian of the future than the great barbaric struggle now convulsing Europe."

The labor leader spoke of the fact that his education was not a result of college training, but that he worked for twenty-six years "at the bench."

"I am not a professor, studying the conditions of labor as I might study those of a bug," he said with a smile. "I am one of you, and the members of my family are of you. My father, son and granddaughter are all members of labor unions, and they are all earning their livings. That isn't so bad for four generations of a proletariat family, is it?"

Mr. Gompers declared his unwavering loyalty to the United States.

GOOD ADVICE.

My advice is that you endeavor to be honestly rich or contentedly poor. In the next place, look to your health, and if you have it praise God and value it next to a good conscience. As for money, neglect it not, but note that there is no necessity of being rich, for there be as many miseries beyond riches as on this side of them, and if you have competence enjoy it with a meek, thankful heart.—Izaak Walton.

A PEEP INTO SPACE

Can the Finite Mind of Man Measure the Universe?

THE LIMITS OF THE VISIBLE.

Science Says the Bounds of the Stellar System Are Definable and That the Universe Is as an Island of Stars in an Infinite Ocean of Ether.

To the visible universe there are attainable limits. It may be that the greatest telescopes have not yet reached the bottom, or the boundaries, of the entire system, but they have almost done so.

This is shown by the thinning out of the fainter stars. These stars, as a whole, are the most distant, and if they were unlimited numerically every increase in the penetrating power of telescopes would bring previously unseen ones into view, in proportionately undiminished numbers.

As a fact, however, there is a rapid falling off in the proportionate numbers at great distances. This is shown by Kapteyn's "law of star density." Taking the "parsec" as the unit of measurement (a parsec is equal to nineteen million million miles), the density of the stars at increasing distances comes out as follows: At 0 distance, 1.00; at 50 parsecs, 0.99; at 135 parsecs, 0.86; at 213 parsecs, 0.67; at 540 parsecs, 0.30; at 850 parsecs, 0.15.

This does not mean that the absolute number of stars decreases with increase of distance, but that the ratio of their number to the volume of space occupied decreases in the proportion shown, so that at a distance of 850 parsecs there are only 15 per cent as many stars as there should be if there had been no falling off in relative density.

Various counts and estimates of the actual numbers included within various limiting distances have been made, and these show that the total number of stars in the visible universe is numerable and probably does not exceed a thousand millions at an outside estimate.

The fact that a fairly definite shape or outline has been found for the visible universe is in itself a proof that it is not unlimited in extent. We are virtually certain that it expands around us in such a manner as to assume roughly the form of a flat, irregular disk, the more distant parts or edges of which lie in the plane of the Milky way. It is thus like a floating island of stars in the ocean of space.

Space itself may be infinite, although what we call the universe is not. As to other universes existing beyond the limits of ours and invisible to us, that is purely a speculation, which appears more or less probable according to the manner in which one's mind approaches it.

But, at any rate, there is no positive evidence of the existence of such outer star systems. From time to time one hears suggestions that this or that nebula is an "outside universe," dimly shining to us from its millions of crowded stars across immeasurable tracts of intervening space. But it is far more probable that no nebula or other object visible in the mightiest telescope is unconnected with the universe to which our sun and our earth belong.

As to the continuance of the Creator's work in forming new suns and new planets, of that there can be no question. This work is, in truth, visibly going on before us in the heavens. There is the utmost variety of ages among the stars, just as there is among the human beings in a crowd. If our lives were lengthened so that a year would be but as a second to us we should see the stars around us disappearing and new ones springing into existence, as we see flowers fading and fresh ones blooming in the garden.

To return for a moment to the question of the infinitude of space, it is well known that the human mind cannot conceive a limit to space, for the instant you attempt to fix or imagine such a limit your imagination flies beyond it. You have got to think of an outside as well as of an inside.

And if you fly to another imagined boundary instantly another outside expanse stretches away before you! It is, then, perfectly legitimate to suppose that, while the visible universe is limited, the invisible universe has no bounds. In comparison with that, all that we see, or can ever see, is, truly, infinitely less than as a grain of sand to a desert or a drop of water to an ocean.—Garrett P. Serviss, in New York Journal.

CHOPSTICKS IN JAPAN.

How They Are Used and How They Are Served In Public Places.

The use of chopsticks is general in Japan, except among the richer classes, who have adopted European knives and forks, and, to some extent, the European cuisine. Small bowls of china or lacquered wood are the usual table equipment. After the various solid portions of the food have been lifted to the mouth with chopsticks the liquid remaining is sipped from the bowl.

In the case of rice, which would be tedious to pick up grain by grain, the bowl is often raised to the mouth and the rice shoveled or pushed in with the chopsticks. It is also customary to pour a little tea into the rice bowl after it has been nearly emptied, and in this way the few remaining grains of rice are washed down as the tea is drunk.

At public places the chopsticks at each meal must be new. This is indicated by the fact that the chopsticks are made from one piece of wood and are left joined together, as were matches at one time in the United States. These new chopsticks are incased in a thin paper envelope, sealed at the end, and bearing Japanese characters advertising either the hotel or some firm that has furnished them free to the proprietor for the sake of the publicity thus gained. Toothpicks, which are freely used by all Japanese at meals, are also inclosed in envelopes that frequently bear advertising matter.—New York Times.

EXPLOSIVES OF WARFARE.

To a Great Extent They Are a Development of Fireworks.

War is a wholesale fireworks celebration. A giant firecracker is really a dangerous bomb, and rifle grenades are but small rockets, carrying high explosives and fired from rifles. Great fort destroying projectiles look simply like gigantic rockets.

The first magazine gun was a Roman candle. The first projectile propelled by an explosive was a rocket. The first shrapnel was a bomb discharging luminous stars instead of bullets.

Modern warfare is, so to speak, a development of Fourth of July ideas.

However, gunpowder—the first explosive—was itself mere play stuff for at least a thousand years before anybody thought of using it for war purposes. It was commonly employed in China for fireworks and crackers during the earliest centuries of the Christian era. The bombs nowadays dropped by military aviators are children's torpedoes magnified to make them deadly.

Really an incendiary bomb was the famous "Greek fire" of the crusaders.

It has been said that shrapnel is a modified fireworks bomb. It has the form of a cylinder, which, at a distance from the gun muzzle suitably timed by a fuse, blows its own head off, throwing out 250 or more lead bullets that travel on their own account with a velocity of 400 feet a second.—Philadelphia Record.

Cemeteries Where Women Gossip.

Friday, the Sabbath of the Moslems, when all true believers of the masculine gender make a point of going to church, their wives, sisters and daughters resort to the cemeteries and wail for the dead. But all their time is not spent in weeping, and sorrow is not the only emotion they display on these occasions. They take with them bunches and garlands of flowers and decorate the graves of their relatives and pray and weep over the dead for a time. Then when this pious duty is performed they gather in little groups and have a good time gossiping about the living. Thus the day of mourning is very popular among the Moslem women. It gives them almost the only opportunity they have of cultivating the acquaintance of their neighbors.

Crowns by Wholesale.

It is told of one of the ancient kings of Egypt that his coronation procession occupied a whole day in passing through the city of Alexandria and that 3,200 crowns of gold were carried by the servants. One crown was three feet in height and twenty-four feet in circumference. There were also carried in the procession sixty-four suits of golden armor, two boots of gold, four and a half feet in length; twelve golden [illegible], ten large vases of perfume [illegible] the baths, twelve ewers, fifty [illegible] and a large number of tables—[illegible] gold. Twenty-three of the 3,200 [illegible] were valued at £234,?00, and it [illegible] surprising that the procession [illegible] guarded by 90,000 soldiers. —St. J[illegible] of peas were delivered at the factory on July 22, and some 115 loads were left over to July 23. He said the produce could not be left 24 hours after the threshing process without material injury, and that in warm weather the peas must be canned immediately or they must be thrown away.

According to Mr. Todd's time cards Mrs. Loungley was employed on the average of 8 hours a day through the month of July and her weekly wage averaged $4.90. She was employed 13 hours in one instance in 24, and 13 1-2 hours in another instance, in violation of the law that limits the daily employment of a woman to 12 hours. Mr. Todd testified that he had employed Mrs. Loungley at night in several instances and when asked by Mr. Quigley if he knew that was a violation of the Labor Law, replied, "I knew it was a violation of the statute."

"Did you know it was a violation of the Labor Law?" reiterated Mr. Quigley, "that is the question."

"I knew it was a violation of the statute," repeated Mr. Todd.

"What do you mean by that?" asked Mr. Quigley. "Don't you intend to observe laws that are made by the legislature of this state."

"In this state, I consider the law unconstitutional," said Mr. Todd.

"Oh! then you don't intend to observe any laws that you don't consider constitutional?" said Mr. Quigley. "In other words, you intend to use your own judgment in the observance of laws? You would excuse a burglar if he didn't consider the law against burglary constitutional and in interference with his profits?"

Mr. Guile objected to the word "profits" and finally to the entire question, but while Mr. Quigley withdrew the word "profits," Mr. Guile's objection to the question was overruled. Mr. Todd answered that he would not excuse a burglar for a violation under those circumstances.

Mr. Quigley asked Mr. Todd if men had ever been employed at pea sorting, and Mr. Todd said they had, but without success, as they considered the work a joke. Mr. Todd said no man or boy was willing to lie around all day for an opportunity of going to the factory a few hours at night, particularly when the pay was only ten cents per hour.

"Did you ever advertise for men?" asked Mr. Quigley. "Or was the fact that women will work cheaper than men the main reason for their employment?"

"Not the main reason," said Mr. Todd. "The women are defter than the men at that work."

Phyician Qualifies Nightwork

Dr. Schlappi testified that night labor for some few hours had no detrimental effect upon the health of a woman, and would not admit under cross-examination by Mr. Quigley that eminent physicians held that night work was injurious. Dr. Schlappi also testified as to the sanitary condition of the Stanwix plant.

Secretary Wettengill of the Stanwix company, formerly of this city, but now of Rome, corroborated Mr. Todd's testimony in regard to the effect that delays in canning have upon produce. He told of instances where the cannery company has tried to save peas by placing them in water until they could be canned and said that in most cases the produce was unsalable and not worth canning after it had been kept over night.

As the matter stands at present, the jury will either be called upon to make a decision based upon the law and the facts, or solely upon the facts, while Judge Wilson will charge them on the law. His Honor said he was willing to allow the jury to decide the case on the law and the facts, provided neither attorney would ask for a charge to the jury, but he is compelled to charge the jury under the city charter, if either attorney asks it. He intimated that he did not care to charge the jury on the law.

The Fort Stanwix company was the defendant in a similar case at Rome yesterday, and Judge Baker of Rome allowed the jury to decide on both the law and the facts.

After the adjournment Inspector Nash said the company was guilty of several violations of the law in the employment of women. He showed a Times reporter a time sheet upon which appeared a number of instances in which women had been employed after 10 o'clock at night in the local plant. Mr. Nash says there are men in the factory who work 120 hours a week, or 20 hours a day for a six-day week.

Mr. Wiggins, at 3 o'clock this afternoon, continued to argue a point at law and the jurors [illegible] bored expression.

MANAGER ADAMS LEAVES CITY

Mr. L. G. Adams, manager of the Fulton Fuel and Light Company, who on account of ill health, resigned his position, is succeeded by Mr. J. G. Light of Niles, Mich.

Mr. and Mrs. Adams will leave here within a short time for their former home in Flint, Mich. They will be greatly missed in social and business circles. Mr. Adams has worked at all times for the best interests of the community as well as the company he represented. During the three years Mr. Adams has been manager of the local plant he has given to the patrons a service that has been highly satisfactory.

In fraternal and Chamber of Commerce circles Mr. Adams has shown a true spirit of the sincere worker. This evening he will be tendered a farewell reception by the members of the Hiram Lodge, F. and A. M. of which organization he is a member.

Mr. and Mrs. Light are welcomed to our thrifty little city with the same sincerity that it bids Mr. and Mrs. Adams God-speed to their new field.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correapondence.

Albany, Sept. 2.—Almost all of the delegates being of the opinion that the salary of 1,500 a year was insuf--ficient for a legislator, the Constitutional Convention by a voteo f 110 to 39, passed the ninth of its proposed amendments to the State Constitution and if the people approve next year the members ofb oth th: senate and Assembly will receive $1,000 and railroad fare one a week to and from their homes.

The proposition to increase the pay of the members of the legislature is not an innovation, as it will be remembered that the legislature passed such a law a few years ago during two successive sessions as is required by the present Constitution and submitted a referendum covering the subject to the people who repudiated it by a large negative vote.

As amended at act of the Constitutional Convention, the new section of Article Three, if substantiated at the polls this fall, will read as follows:

"Each member of the legislature shall receive for his services an annual salary of $2,500. The members of each house shall also receive the railroad fare actually paid in going to and from and returning from their place of meeting on the most usual route, but not oftener than once each week during any session of the legislature. Such railroad fare shall be repaid only on the verified voucher of the member entitled thereto after audit by the comptroller. Senators, when the Senate alone is convened in extraordinary session, or when serving as members of the court for the trial of impeachments, and such members of the assembly, not exceeding nine in number, as shall be appointed managers of an impeachment, shall receive an additional allowance of ten dollars a day."

Although the belief has prevailed that sessions of the legislature endure but one hundred days and that for that period of time the salary of $1,500 was ample, as a matter of fact there have been few sessions of recent years that have been as short. The majority of them have been four to five months' duration and on top of them extraordinary sessions have been called.

The members of the Constitutional Convention, who have to date sat for practically five months, have found that to make laws, much time and deliberation was required and that to formulate prospective statutes a given length of time does not adequately measure effort. Practically all who are sitting as members of the convention have already expended their salaries as delegates which is the same as though they had been either Senators or Assemblymen. This experience hash ad the effect of convincing all but thirty-nine of the delegates that the sum of $1,500 is entirely too small a salary forl aw-makers to receive.

Very few of the clerks attached to the two houses, except the committee clerks, haver eceived as small as those of the legislators themselves. In a few instances their compensation runs up into the thousands.

SUPERVISORS AUTHORIZE SELLING BRIDGE BONDS

At yesterday's meeting of the Board of Supervisors, held in Oswego, the towns of Volney and Oswego were authorized to issue bonds in $23,000 at 4 1-2 per cent. for thec onstruction of the Minetto bridge. A bond issue of $20,000 by the county of Oswego was also authorized. The remaining $3,000 of the county's share will be raised in the county levy for 1916, it is proposed. County Attorney Gallagher advised that this could be done.

The town bonds are payable in installments, 1915 to 1931, and the county bonds in installments of $5,000 each for the next four years.

Mr. Wilson presented the report of the special committee of the Board of Supervisors approving the contract for the bridge, and this report was accepted and approved by resolution offered by Mr. Nichols.

The chairman named T. R. Siver, V. D. Pierce, G. A. Jackson, F. M. Riley and George Pomphret, to audit the bills presented. At 3 o'clock a recess of half an hour was taken.

Later in the afternoon it is expected that T. H. King of the County Welfare Board will make an appeal for an appropriation for the board.

OREINTALS ONLY COMPETE IN ATHLETIC MEET

Middletown, Conn., Sept. 2.—Six colleges were entered in the Chinese intercollegiate track meet in connection with the eleventh annual conference of the Chinese Students' Alliance, and a crowd of several hundred Chinese students, including a score or more of Chinese girls, watched the team from Massachusetts Institute of Technology win the meet with 42 1-2 points. The University of Chicago was second with 30 points, while the Cornell students scored 16 points and the University of Pennsylvania athletes 11. Yale made 3 1-2 points on Princeton brought up the tail end with a total of 3.

S. S. Kwang of Massachusetts Institute of Technology and W. K. Chang of Chicago, were the stars for their colleges, each scoring 27 points. Fair timew as made in some of the events. the 100-yard dash being covered in 10 4-5 seconds, while in the shot-put Chang made a record of 34 feet 1 1-2 inches. Kai Fu Shah, the Chinese Minister to the United States, witnessed the meet.

BRITAIN SETS FREE AMERICAN RUNAWAYS

London, Sept. 2.—According to information in possession of the American Embassy here, no less than fifty American boys, all under eighteen years, have have run away from home and enlisted in Canadian regiments. Every one of these has been sent to his home as the result of instructions cables by the State Department, and the co-operation of the British Government.

One queer feature is that almost every boy enlisted under his own name.

The total number of Americans above eighteen years who are now serving with the British army necessarily is a matter of guesswork, but from what the Embassy hears it exceeds 10,000.

GROW ENGLISH WALNUTS HERE

Growers in Session at Rochester Advise to Make Waste Land Useful---Nut Trees Urged.

Rochester, Sept. 2.—Grow English walnuts.

This was the advice of members of the Northern Nut Growers' Association at the conclusion of their ride through Rochester and the vicinity yesterday afternoon.

"We saw hundreds of these trees which have sprung up from the seed." said Dr. W. C. Deming, of Georgetown, Conn., secretary and treasurer of the organization, which is holding its sixth annual convention at the Powers Hotel. "No two are alike. Some are worthless for fruit; others are producing walnuts that are exceptional in quality. We want to separate the good from the bad and propagate them."

He defined the purpose of the association as being the education of the public regarding the value of nuts, the developing of the trees most suitable for al ecality and thec onsequent inducemento f their planting. About fifty of the 250 members are attending the sessions.

"Nuts are a wonderfully nourishing food," he confided. "They offer a substitute for meat, which is becoming scarcer and costlier every year."

Pilgrimage to Nut Trees

The itinerary of the trip yesterday was as follows: No. 230 Saratoga avenue, Persian walnut seedling; Kramer, Emerson street and Lake avenue, Persian walnut, the parent tree t oseedlings in Thompson grove, East Avon; Westgate Farm, Stone road, Persian walnut seedlings andfilbert trees imported from England; W. H. Anderson and William Twitchell, Ridge road, seedling walnuts, one tree being 105 years old; Hilton, Holden trees from which thisv ariety of nursery, Denise road, filbert plantings, 2 years old; Clifford avenue between St. Paul and Clinton avenue north, seedling walnuts, Spiegel park, seedling walnuts; Culver road and Parsells avenue, hybrid walnuts and butternuts; Charlotte, Abram's walnut tree, which is enormous and produces large sized nuts. The visitors were much impressed with thev alue of this last tree.

Surprise was expressed at the fine walnut trees in Rochester. This afternoon the growers will visit the grove of Adelbert Thompson at East Avon, who has experimented in the growing of walnuts as ac ommercial proposition and will have such a large yield this year that he is worrying how he will dispose of it.

Might Grow Pecans Here

The association in offering ap rize of fifty dollars to the grower who can develop a hazel nut or filbert that will withstand blight and produce nuts of commercial size. The American hazel nut is so small that it is fit for nothing but squirrel food. It is the growers' conviction that the filbert is worth experimenting with in the backyards of Rochester as is also the Northern pecan.

"Pecans," said Dr. J. Russell Smith, president of the association and professor in the University of Pennsylvania, "areg rown in this vicinity, They are hardy but non-producers, but I believe that a treew ill be developed here that will yield bounteously."

Dr. Smith is convinced that the waste land of New York may be made immensely valuable by planting nut trees. He prefers the grafting method.

"Not only will it add great wealth to the state," he said, "but it will open up a wonderful food supply. We are just at the portals of nut production. By hybridizing and selection, we shall develop better nuts. Take the pecan, the kind bought in stores is underirable but the pecan we are developing has meats that come free from the shell. Tree breeding is opening up to us an entirely new agriculture."

The hickory nut, black walnut and butternut came in for some attention also at yesterday's conference.

Among the speakers of yesterday were Hugh P. Baker, Dean of the New York State College of Forestry and Professor E. N. Fagan, of Pennsylvania State College. Dean Baker advised the planting of nut trees along the roads saying that it would beautify the roads and increase the wealth of the communities along them.

JUDGE DEFENDS COUNTY IN PROBING FRANK CASE

Marietta, Ga., Sept. 2.—The Cobb county Grand Jury announced today and continued the work of probing into Leo Frank's death. At yesterday's jury session Judge Patterson told the jury it was not a special Grand Jury and that while its members were not feel they were secret service men, it was their duty to ferret out any crime alleged to have been committed within the county "fearless and without hope of reward."

The Judge took occasion to defend Cobb county against attacks upon it growing out of the lynching, saying that "a good deal that has been said recently in the press, the facts have been deviated from, and I want to strongly assert that the press generally has done Cobb county a great injustice."

"It appears," he continued, "that in a great deal of the matter that has been published, some newspaper correspondents have seemingly gotten just as far away from the truth as they could, and the result has been that Cobb county has ben made to suffer for it."

Judge Patterson did not mention Frank's name.

Prior to charging the jury the court cautioned the bailiff that he be "especially cautious in the care of any papers or documents intrusted to your care. Any matter delivered to you for transmission to the Grand Jury should have your protection," he said.

Among the witnesses summoned are O. B. Keeler, a newspaper man, who will be asked to tell how he came in possession of Frank's wedding ring, which he says was mysteriously delivered to him with a request from Frank to see that it be delivered to Mrs. Frank.

DAIRY SCORING AT THE FAIR

The recently announced educational scoring of butter and cheese at the Syracuse state fair will take place at eleven o'clock Thursday, September 16, in the Dairy Building of the State Fair grounds. This exact time and place of the meeting has been fixed by the fair authorities after a conference with the Cornell dairy students' association, under whose auspices the scoring will be conducted.

Competent judges have been secured and they will discuss thev ariations in the butter and cheese exhibits, with their probable causes. The Cornell association feels that the average dairy operator may not have an opportunity in connection with his own work to compare products with those of other plants, and the purpose of this educational scoring, it is announced, is to give an opportunity for such a comparison, and to familiarize dairymen with the qualities which dairy products should possess to command the best markets.

The dairy meeting is open to all who are in any way interested in the quality of butter or cheese, whether they be producers, dealers or consumers. A special point is made by the fair authorities that all are invited, because the continuation of this educational feature in future years is said to depend on the success of the meeting announced for September 16. They urge, therefore, that a large number should be present to take part in this butter and cheese scoring.

Many dairymen throughout New York, who lack facilities for making tests of milk and cream for their butter fat content, have availed themselves of the opportunity offered by the New York State college of agriculture at Cornell to have such tests made at the college.

The college authorities say, however, that samples sent by the dairymen have not reached the laboratories promptly, and that they have not been in good condition for making the tests when they arrive. For this reason, the dairy department suggests that the following precautions be taken when samples are submitted:

Care should be taken to fill the bottle full to the cork or stopper in order to prevent the contents from shaking up and down and thus becoming churned. It is also well to add three or four drops of formalin to the sample, and shake this in thoroughly so that the formalin will act as a preservative throughout all portions of the sample. Three or four ounces of milk or cream furnish an amount sufficient for a test.

All samples should be addressed to the department of dairy industry, New York state college of agriculture, Ithaca, New York. If they are sent simply to the state college, without designating the dairy department,they are likely to be delayed in reaching their proper destination.

SIR EDWARD GREY RIDDLES EDICT

Says Germany's War Excuse of Russian Mobilization the Result of Court Intrigue---Mediation Refused.

London, Sept. 2.—The Foreign Office last night, replying to recent German statements concerning the origin of the war, issued the following statement:

"First—The Germans maintain that the reason which led to the rejection of the proposal for a conference was the mobilization of Russia. In paper No. 43 of our White Book Sir E. Goschen, British Ambassador at Berlin, reported a conversation with the German Secretary of State refusing a conference.

"The Secretary of State said that the suggested conference would practically amount to a court of arbitration, and could not, in his opinion, be called together except at the request of Austria and Russia. He maintained that such a conference was not practicable. He further said that if Russia mobilized against Germany, the latter would have to follow suit. As when he refused a conference he referred to the possibility of Russian mobilization, it cannot now be maintained that the resaon for the refusal was the fact that Russia was mobilizing.

"As a matter of fact the proposal for a conference was made on July 26, 1914, andw as refused by Germany on July 27, 1914, while it was not until July 31 that orders were given for a general mobilization in Russia. On that day Germany presented an ultimatum to Russia requiring an undertaking that with twelve hours the Russian forces should be mobilized.

"Second—Doubt is thrown in Germany on the assurance we gave Belgium in 1913 that we should not land troops in that country except in the case of violation of its territory by another power. Assurance was not only given to, the Belgian Minister, but Sir F. Villiers gave Sir E. Grey's record of it to the Belgian government at the time. This assurance appeared in the collected diplomatic documents. Why is is doubted? It is because the Germans have not allowed the reproduction of the documentw hich is so damning to their case.

"Third—The final interview between Sir E. Grey and Prince Lichnowsky, German Ambassador at London. This interview, strictly private, was held at a private house and no record was made of it. But Sir E. Grey is certain that he never made the statement quoted by the North German Gazette with regard to the decisive factor in Great Britain's participation in the war, nor did hes peak, of mediation in favor of Germany. If need be a fuller statement will be made in Parliament on the subject.

"Fourth—The immediate cause of this war was the dispute between Austria and Serbia, which then turned into a dispute between Austria and Russia. Yet it is worthy of note that it was Germany who declared war against Russia and France. The Austrian Ambassador remained in Petrogrd after the German Ambassador left. Germany declared war on Russia on August 1, and Austria on August 6, 1914."

"SOLDIER A SLAVE" WITHOUT HIS RIGHTS

London, Sept. 2.—George Bernard Shaw, writing today on the question of compulsory service says:

"I do not think anybody is justified in asking anybody else to join the army. It is a serious question which every man should decide for himself.

"It seems to me that all Socialists should advocate compulsory national service, both civil and military, but compulsory soldiering is another matter. A soldier is a slave, without rights of any kind.

"There is no reason why the work of the army should not be done by citizens with full civil rights. I have dealt with the question in the preface of 'John Bull's Other Island' and in my 'Common Sense About the War.'

"Human nature breaks down under the strain of war as it does under the strain of fever. You must regard the people at present as more or less delirious; they will come right again when the war is over."

Many people are excellent conversationalists on the subject of themselves, as has been observed by a wise philosopher. But they are terribly poor listeners on any other subject. —Rochester (N. Y.) Times.

LETTERS ISSUED ON ESTATE OF AUTO ACCIDENT VICTIM

Letters of administration were issued by Surrogate Miller yesterday to Roy E. Tovey of Oswego, on the estate of Benjamin Wilber, who was killed on the State road near Minetto about a month ago, when an Oswego man's automobile knocked Wilber down causing injuries that soon after caused his death.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

The Verdict

A Trick of Fate That Sent a Man to His Doom

By CLARENCE JAMES FLEMING

Copyright by Frank A. Munsey Co.

The white haired judge paused.

For an instant the courtroom was hushed, breathless, like an ominous calm before an electric storm, a stillness so intense and oppressive that it tried the overwrought sensibilities of the principals and even had its effect on the curious mass of morbid humanity which completely filled the historic old courtroom and overflowed into the broad corridor beyond. Then the silence was broken:

"May God direct and control your verdict."

With these low, solemn words the judge finished his charge to the jury and left the fate of James Stanley Black in their hands.

The jurors silently filed into the jury room, and a court attendant touched the prisoner on the arm.

Without a parting glance at the array of lawyers who had been laboring in his defense and apparently unconscious of the spectators who stood up in their places and stared in his direction, Black arose and followed the officer from the room.

When he reached his cell he threw himself down on the hard wooden bench and sat staring at the floor.

His appearance now was a marked contrast to that shown in the courtroom.

During the many weeks of the trial he had appeared day after day a calm, confident, aggressive business man, and the legal proceedings seemed to be mere detail.

But here in the dimly lighted, vault-like room, beyond the gaze of the curious public, he was off his guard, and the ghastly pallor of his cheeks and the deep black circles under his eyes showed the effect of the daily grilling he had gone through.

For a long time he sat in a deep, dejected study. He was worried, desperately worried, for he realized that his only hope for freedom lay with the jury, which was even now deciding his fate.

If they found him innocent he was free, but if they decided against him he was doomed—doomed to serve a long term in state prison.

Heretofore he had laughed at the law, for he had learned from experience that money could whitewash most misdeeds, but now it was different.

He had been caught juggling with the funds of a national bank, and the federal authorities were determined to make an example of him.

He was awakened from his morbid thoughts by the entry of Colonel Baker, his lifelong friend and chief counsel.

After a few minutes' conversation the colonel prepared to leave.

"Better lie down and try to get a little rest," he advised, "for we expect a verdict before midnight."

"Will you be allowed to see me again tonight?" queried the imprisoned financier.

"Not unless a verdict is reached."

"It's going to be mighty hard sitting here all evening without some word of how the jury stands," protested Black.

"THERE ARE ALWAYS RUMORS," CONTINUED THE PRISONER.

The colonel looked enigmatically at his client.

"There are always rumors," continued the prisoner, "and I want to be kept informed."

"Impossible."

"Not if you follow a plan I have thought out," explained the financier as he motioned for the attorney to come over to the iron barred window.

"See that alley," pointing out of the window toward a small areaway leading from the rear of the jail to a main thoroughfare beyond.

The colonel nodded his head.

"Isn't that directly in back of your office?"

"Yes, that second doorway leads into our building."

"Good. Arrange to have a lantern placed there tonight; a white light if the jury is favorable and a red light if otherwise."

"Good scheme," acknowledged the attorney. "I'll arrange with the watchman to look after the lights, and I sincerely hope he will need but one lantern—the white."

For a long time after the attorney's departure Black carefully thought over the case, searching his mind for the weak spots in his defense and going over the strong, damaging points his prosecutor had made.

Finally the prisoner went to the window and stood with his face close to the heavy iron bars and peered out into the night.

At 8 o'clock a wavering white light appeared in the alleyway, and with eager eyes he watched it swing backward and forward, then stop and remain stationary.

The pure white light warmed his heart—the rumors were favorable.

Humming a lively tune, he turned away and started gathering together his books, papers and few belongings which he would take home with him, for it would not be long now until he was free.

The packing finished, he again strolled over to the window and looked out.

The light had disappeared.

No; there it was, but now a dull, sullen red.

Perspiration burst from his pores, and he quivered in every nerve as he groped his way back to the bed.

The weeks of mental worry, like a slow poison or a wasting sickness, had steadily but surely undermined his system, and now when hope, the greatest tonic of all, had gone he collapsed.

His head was racked with shooting pains, the straining eyeballs seemed to be bursting from their sockets, and he could not think rationally. His mind was forever going off on some wild, demoniacal tangent.

His breath came in painful gasps, he was stifled, suffocating, and he had an insane, maddening desire to shriek. Then came an attack of dizziness. He fainted.

Slowly the wretched man regained consciousness.

First there was a restless twitching of the facial muscles, then the eyelids quivered and opened.

Mechanically he raised himself on one elbow, and his dazed orbs peered around the cell, gradually picking out the familiar objects. Then, like the lifting of a curtain, came memory, and what a memory!

Like the fantasy of a terrible nightmare, he lived over his past life.

Vague, shadowy forms, people of his distorted mind, victims of his business career, appeared and swept along in a gibbering, mocking review.

A nameless awe came over him as he reviewed this weird, uncanny assembly of phantasms, for during the years of his mad struggle for success he had never stopped to think of the many he had ruined, businesses he had wrecked, and all to further his own ends.

The people who had opposed him never seemed real; he had thought of them only as obstacles, barriers that must be overcome, pushed aside or crushed.

Even his transactions at the bank were not those of common theft. It was true he had speculated with the depositors' money, but that was only high finance. Others did it every day, only they were not found out, and he was.

His mind wandered back to the days of his childhood—of his mother.

How proud she had been of his success! How she had mothered him and fussed over him even when he was a full grown up man, and then her death!

How thankful he was that she had not lived to feel his disgrace, for it would not be long until he was branded a criminal; then prison, where he would no longer be a man, but a number, a thing in striped clothes.

The hardship of penal servitude did not worry him as much as that thought of what life would mean after he had served his sentence.

He would be a broken, old man, a jailbird, and even his wealth could not protect him from ridicule and distrust.

Then from the inner fastness of his mind came the thought that he was not convicted yet and that every man is assumed to be innocent until proved guilty.

Eagerly his mind caught at the words—innocent until proved guilty. He repeated them over and over in a low, thoughtful undertone.

A change came over the tortured prisoner, his body stiffened and his eyes glittered with a new purpose.

If he should die now before sentence was pronounced he would not go down in history as a convicted criminal, but in the eyes of the law an innocent man.

He was face to face with two alternatives—

Prison—or—suicide!

In those few short seconds he had made his choice—death!

The snuffing out of his life would mean but a few seconds of suffering, while prison would mean a life of misery.

His mind was made up. He would end it all.

He reached into an inner pocket and pulled out a small package of powders that had been given him by his physician to ward off sleepless nights, but, unknown to the doctor or the jailers, Black had slipped a different powder into one of the tissue folders.

This particular powder was marked with a black cross.

With trembling fingers he poured out a glass of water, into which he emptied the white, chalklike substance.

Suddenly the very air seemed to be surcharged with life, lights appeared in the court wing beyond, then the sound of voices and the hurrying of feet.

A verdict had been reached.

He arose unsteadily to his feet and peered out of the window. The red light was still there. He crawled back to bed.

He clutched the fatal glass and raised it to his lips.

He had reached the Rubicon—the river of black, mysterious waters, which separate the real from the great, awful beyond.

His soul hesitated on the brink, sending a chill of doubt into his heart.

Would the fatal plunge mean complete extinction of life, absolute annihilation, or would the resurrection beyond the veil reveal greater trials, greater sorrows?

Slowly the poison was lowered from the trembling lips.

He didn't want to die. There must be some other way.

If he could only escape!

But it was too late, for he could hear the sound of heavy footsteps in the corridor beyond. They were coming for him now.

His features grew cruel and hard as he listened to the steps drawing nearer and nearer.

With a grating snarl he swore they would never get him in that courtroom again.

Again he reached for the fatal glass.

Back, back, warned the soul, but its feeble suggestion was drowned out by the mad waves of thought that surged through the weakened mind, crying:

"End it all! End it all! End it all!"

Slowly the glass was raised to the quivering lips.

The soul again peered into the black cloud of uncertainty, only to encounter a monstrous, quivering thing, shrouded in the habiliments of the grave, a body and yet not a body, a phantom and yet not a phantom, an apparition and not an apparition, and with a low, moaning sigh surrendered to the arch enemy of all mankind, the cloven footed angel of the bottomless pit—despair.

With an encouraging chuckle Despair reached out its sable clad arm and motioned the wretch to drink.

The man still hesitated.

With a savage, impatient gesture Despair rent asunder the curtain of what might be.

Instantly the interior of the courtroom appeared before the prisoner's eyes, the judge on the bench, the jury filing into their places and himself in the prisoner's box.

Then came the judge's question:

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you reached a verdict?"

"We have, your honor," announced the foreman, rising in his place.

"What say you, guilty or not guilty?"

The poor wretch's fingers tightened around the tumbler as he stared at the picture of the foreman's stern features. He knew the worst had happened.

With a low, terror stricken groan he tilted the glass and drained the poison to the dregs.

The fiery liquid gurgled down his throat. He fell back.

The slow, measured tread in the corridor without was joined by another, quicker and lighter.

Both stopped in front of the cell door, the key was turned and Colonel Baker hurried into the cell.

He saw the body stretched out on the bed, apparently asleep.

"Get up!" he called.

But the man on the bed did not hear. He was beyond the control of any human verdict or punishment!

Instantly the colonel surmised what had happened. He leaned down and put his hand over the financier's heart.

"Dead!" he said to the officer.

Then he looked out of the window and, without a word of explanation, rushed from the cell and out into the night.

There in the alleyway stood an automobile—Black's own touring car, which had been ordered to take him home.

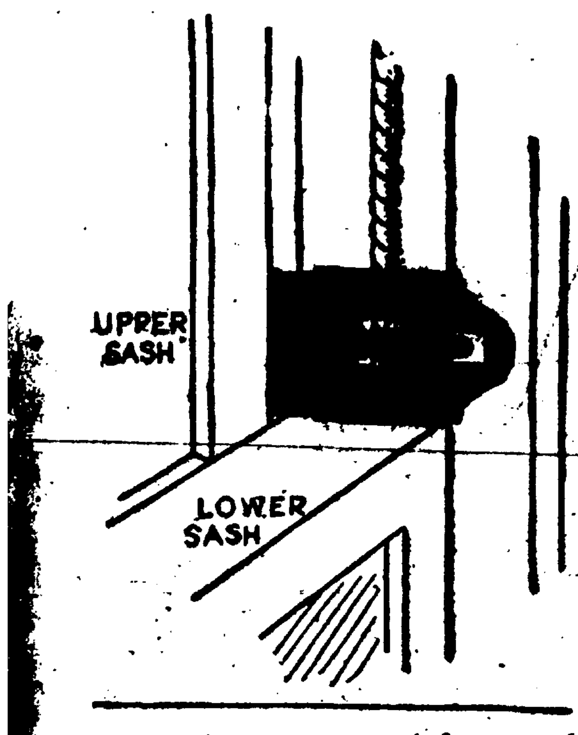
The rear of the car was toward the prison window, and the red tail light glowed like a ball of fire!

Beyond, and completely hidden by the body of the machine, was the white lantern on the doorstep.

"The verdict from which there is no appeal," shuddered the attorney as he turned and walked slowly back to the courtroom.

HINTS FOR THE BUSY HOUSEWIFE

Catch That Makes an Open Window Burglar Proof.



To make an open window proof against further opening by intruders is the object of a little device that has just been put upon the market. It consists of two pieces of metal sliding on each other and moved by a right and left screw. The ends of the pieces of metal are bent over at right angles, and the bent over part is covered with sharp points.

The lower sash of a window is raised a few inches, and this apparatus is put on top of it, the broad flange pressing against the inside of the window casing, the narrow flange against the upper sash and the upright bar that separates the two sashes. The screw is then turned by a key until it fits tightly, when neither upper nor lower sash can be raised or lowered. In other words, the window is locked, and if it is not wide enough open to admit a body no one can enter.

Boiled Salad Dressing.

One and one-half cupfuls of milk, two eggs, slightly beaten; four teaspoonfuls of sugar, two and one-half teaspoonfuls of mustard, two teaspoonfuls of salt, three tablespoonfuls of melted butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour, cayenne pepper and one-half cupful of vinegar.

Mix the dry ingredients and blend with them one-fourth of a cupful of the milk. Heat the rest of the milk to boiling, add the butter, thicken with the first mixture and boil for two minutes. Cautiously pour this hot liquid on the slightly beaten eggs, stirring constantly. Cook over hot water until it begins to thicken; remove, gradually stir in the vinegar and then carefully reheat until it thickens again. Cool so as to prevent curdling and pour into scalded glass vessels. This rule makes more than a pint of rather mild dressing, which will keep for a long time in a cold place.

Baked Ham and Potatoes.

Lay a thick slice of ham, one and one-quarter inch thick, in the bottom of a covered baking dish. The roaster is fine for this. Next slice enough raw potatoes for your dinner and place on top of ham, sprinkle on pepper, but no salt, and pour on enough rich milk to come almost to top of potatoes. Cover tightly and bake two hours. When finished thoroughly the potatoes and ham will have absorbed all the milk. The ham will be freshened and delightfully tender and digestible and the potatoes seasoned just right. If ham is not fat enough a lump of butter can be used. If you have no roaster a crock with a good cover will answer nicely.

Elderberry Wine.

Over eight quarts of elderberries pour four quarts of boling water and allow to stand for twelve hours, stirring occasionally. At the end of that time strain, pressing out the juice. To this add one tablespoonful of ground cloves, two tablespoonfuls of ground cinnamon and three pounds of sugar. These proportions are proper for four quarts of juice. Boil for five minutes and set away in a stone jar to ferment, keeping covered with a cloth. When fermentation ceases pour off carefully, bottle and seal.

Tomato Mincemeat.

For green tomato mincemeat use one peck, or fifteen pounds, of green tomatoes, chopped fine; boil fifteen minutes and drain. Then add one-half pound of suet, chopped fine; two pounds of raisins, chopped; four pounds of light brown sugar, one cupful of vinegar, two tablespoonfuls of salt, one tablespoonful of cinnamon, one tablespoonful of cloves, one tablespoonful of nutmeg, one tablespoonful of allspice. Mix these all together and cook about one-half hour, stirring often.

Burns and Scalds.

A burn is caused by dry heat and a scald by moist heat. Where there is no blister or broken skin cover the burn with thick cloths wet in a solution of strong baking soda. Keep these dressings wet continually until the pain is allayed. If blisters have already broken do not let the raw surface be exposed to dirt. Cover with clean cloths saturated with a solution of baking soda.

Copper Used In Warfare.

More than 200,000 tons of copper will have been used for military purposes in the first year of the war.

Character Forming In Youth.

It was a saying of Froebel's that the character of a man or woman is fixed at six years of age, thus putting the formative period very early in the development of the child.

Most mothers do not believe this dictum or ignore it, as they intrust their children to nurses more during those first six years than at any other time. There are, however, an increasing number of women who realize that good habits are more easily formed and good impressions more easily made in very early childhood than later on. So now careful mothers are arranging to supervise as thoroughly as possible the nurseries of their babies and to take an active share in the training of the little ones.

One modern mother, though possessed of ample means, refuses to employ a regular nurse. She takes entire charge of her two little children, a girl of four and a boy of two. This is not the result of theory on her part, but an outgrowth from her own experience. Brought up in a luxurious household, waited on "hand and foot" by an attentive nurse, she was suddenly sent off to boarding school at the age of fourteen.

"I shall never forget," she says, "my terrible mortification at not being able to dress myself properly or even to comb my own hair. I used to cry myself to sleep at night and dread getting up in the morning to encounter that awful problem of getting neatly into my clothes."

Determined that her children shall never be helpless, she has taught these little mites to look after themselves in quite a wonderful way.

Some years ago Punch had a picture of two small boys and a young lady asking one of them, "How old is your little friend, Tommy?" To which Tommy replies, "I do not know, but I think he must be pretty old, because he can blow his own nose!"

Judged by this standard, the boy of two referred to above would be "pretty old," while the girl would be positively aged. It has taken an infinity of patience to get these children to the point of efficiency which they now enjoy, but it has certainly paid the mother for all her trouble. It is much easier to take a child and dress it than it is to sit by and see it fumble itself into its garments. These two children are still bathed in the tub, but otherwise, as the Scotch say, they "sort" themselves.

There are many practical details to be considered in such work. Clothes must be made simple, so as to offer as few difficulties to little fingers as may be. The faucets in the bathroom are not only an obstacle to a child, but also a temptation to play with water and mess clean frocks, so a washing apparatus must be arranged.

The particular mother whose methods are quoted above obtained a kindergarten table such as that on which the children play their games. It has the advantage of being exactly the right height and at the same time of being both solid and stable. Painted white this answered for a washstand. Then came the question of utensils. Stoneware was too heavy, and china, though light enough to be easily handled, was quickly broken by inexpert little hands.

The answer to this problem came from enameled ware, which is made nowadays in a number of attractive colors. Pretty enameled basins and pitchers, not too large to be lifted even when full, make implements the children can safely manage. Soap dish, toothbrush mug and slop pail complete the outfit. Nothing can be broken, nothing is heavy, and yet all is clean, fresh and inviting.

The little girl worked her initials on her little face cloths in cross stitch, and "brother" will do the same when sufficiently advanced. Supper is always eaten in the nursery, and these tots set their own table, another kindergarten table, and their table utensils are also enameled ware in attractive colors, so that cups and saucers, plates and pitchers can be manipulated without risk.

They are very earnest about this task of setting table, and woe betide the child whose dishes are not set in the proper order by the waitress or waiter of the day!

Visitors say, "How cunning, how clever the dear little things are!" but not one in a dozen realizes the work and the patience that are put in the training.

Rich will be the reward when the children are older. The independence they have acquired will be more valuable to them than a fortune, for it will be a fortune that cannot be lost.

For the Housekeeper's File.

According to the September Woman's Home Companion September is the month for all housekeepers:

"To make the acquaintance of your children's new teachers.

"To plan varied and healthful school lunches.

"To see that the furnace and pipes are in working order.

"To do all necessary painting around the house and fences.

"To have the roof examined and repaired if necessary.

"To choose and order any new wall paper.

A FROCK FOR JUNIORS AND GIRLS.

Neat and stylish is this frock in blue serge with pleated skirt and belted blouse, worn with a Quaker collar of organdy.

A very excellent model for making a dressy looking frock for practical purposes is shown here. There is a middy blouse, which almost loses its identity, however, behind the pocketed belt and Quaker collar. Accompanying this is a one-piece pleated skirt with a box-pleat at the center-back and center-front. The skirt is attached to an underbody with high or open neck, preference being given to the latter.

For a girl of eight years the materials required are 3 yards 44-inch serge, with ⅞ yard lining 27 inches wide for the underbody and ⅓ yard organdy for the [illegible] collar. A collar of serge, however, stitched with red or blue silk braid, is also becoming.

In cutting out the dress it will be found that the cuff, underbody front and back are omitted in the cutting guide, but these parts are provided in the pattern and small "o" perforations indicate the open neck in case it is preferred to the high effect.

The skirt sections are laid on a lengthwise fold of the material, and the piecings are sandwiched between the main skirt sections on a lengthwise thread of the serge. Upon the remainder of the material the collars, lap and back are first arranged, right along the lengthwise fold of goods. The pocket, the front and the sleeves are placed on a lengthwise thread, while the belt is cut from the strip between the selvage and the back and sleeve, beginning at the right of the front.

The under-back front and back can be arranged on the lining, just as are the front and back sections of the middy, so that no difficulty will be met in cutting them.

If plain cuffs are not desired with the sleeves the elbow sleeve may be substituted and finished with shaped, turn-back cuffs, trimmed with fancy buttons.

A GIRLISH DESIGN.

This simple frock is developed with white net or chiffon over pale pink. Its shortish skirt is finished with a wreath of roses, which also complete the unique sleeves, while two rose clusters finish the corsage and belt line.

The Cotton Net on New Handkerchiefs.

Sheer linen lawn is the material of which most of the handkerchiefs are made with the exception of the glove handkerchiefs, and they are usually made of crepe de chine. Cotton net or tulle forms the border band on which is gathered a plaited frill of the net, one inch wide. So it would seem that the frill has invaded even the realm of mouchoirs. Linen lawn in rose, straw and blue with rounded corners are the handkerchiefs that boast the net or tulle frill. Square corners are reserved for those with the hemstitched finish.

Tree Leaves and Water.

Ash leaves are capable of taking up more water than those of most other trees. In a hundred pounds of ash leaves are eighty-five of water, in the same weight of beech leaves seventy-five, of maple sixty, of pine fourteen and of fir ten.

HAMS OF WESTPHALIA.

Processes by Which They Are Cured and Flavored.

The famous Westphalian hams, which are eaten without cooking, are cured by an elaborate process that has been worked out patiently and skillfully by generations of expert workmen. A writer in the New York Sun thus describes the process:

After being rubbed thoroughly with a solution in which there are 100 pounds of salt to one pound of saltpeter, the hams are placed on cement floors, or in vats, and thickly strewn with salt. They lie under salt for two weeks and then pass to a vat that contains a 22 per cent solution of brine. They remain in that solution for eighteen days. Every day they are shifted in the vat; the hams on the bottom are brought to the top, and vice versa.

At the end of the eighteen days the hams are packed, one upon another, in a cool, dry cellar, where they remain for four weeks, in order to ripen—that is, to take on color and become tender. Then the salt is washed off with a stiff brush dipped in lukewarm water, and the hams are put to soak for twelve hours in fresh water. After that they are ready for the smokehouse.

The smokehouses are two or three stories high, with holes bored in the flooring. The fires are kindled on the ground floor, and the meat is hung on the second and third floors. The fires are made entirely of beech wood, but the workmen constantly throw juniper berries and juniper twigs on the embers. The fire burns brightly. It is checked with beech wood sawdust whenever it burns too briskly.

The smoking continues for about eight days. Under the ancient curing methods, however, the hams were often kept in the smoke rooms for six weeks, and it is by this latter method that the best hams are still made by the country folk of Westphalia.

Advice to Girls Who Work

Do you possess a bank account?

If you are the wife of a man of affairs or the daughter of some well paid worker you may answer in the affirmative without a thought as to the desirability of this possession. If, on the other hand, you are one of the thousands of working women who can depend only upon their own brains to bring in their daily portion of bread you may be forced to admit that a bank account has been the object of your dreams for many a year, but that you have never been able to make it a realization, try as hard as you could.

Few business women know how to save money.

"But," perhaps you remonstrate, "how can I put anything away when all my salary goes to pay my way in the world?"

Saving is no doubt difficult when the weekly stipend is small, but even under these circumstances something should be put away if for no other reason than the one of cultivating the saving habit. Hundreds—no, thousands—of women have enough intelligence to make money, and good sums of money, too, but few have enough sense to save even a small portion of their earnings.

And yet a bank account is their only protection against sickness, old age or loss of position—the only means of giving the worker any independence and personal freedom.

The girl who has no bank account is forced to put up with all sorts of inconveniences; she cannot give up employment which is uncongenial, because she has nothing to draw upon while looking for another opening. If she becomes ill she must call upon friends or relatives for aid, and if she is so unfortunate as to be alone in the city she may even be forced to become the object of charity.

With this possibility in view one would think that every feminine worker would realize the importance of saving. But apparently few wage earners do. You find the girl behind the counter spending her nickels and her dimes on candies and the movies just as you find her sister in a higher scale of endeavor throwing away her hard earned dollars on innumerable new hats, blouses and theater tickets. Both have the happy optimism which is characteristic of many women who earn their living. They live in the present, refusing to look into the future.

Begin now to put away something every week. Perhaps it will be only 25 cents if the pay envelope is pitifully small, but 25 cents every week amounts to a fair sum at the end of the year. The point at the beginning is not how much you save, but the fact that you save consistently. After awhile the sum will increase, and, having acquired the saving habit, you will have at your disposal a sum of money that is quite respectable in its proportions.

The greatest drawback to saving is that once a woman has a good position she believes she will go on holding it indefinitely. Unfortunately, prosperity brings optimism with it, and few women who are making more money than usual can persuade themselves that they may ere long make less. Then to the prosperous woman saving is unattractive; its returns look to her to be so insignificant. (We are referring now to the wage earner and not to the woman who can put by a $100 at a time.) For the wage earner saving is saving pure and simple.

Four Interesting Dishes For Luncheon.

Creamed Toast With Cheese Sauce.—This makes an excellent breakfast dish. Make slices of toast from whole wheat bread. Make a white sauce in the proportion of two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour added to one cupful of milk. To each cupful of milk add one-half cupful of grated cheese. As soon as this is melted pour over the toast and serve. Two or three dates, pitted and shredded, may be added to this dish.

Creamed Chicken.—Breast and thighs were served for Sunday's dinner; the rest is picked and put in cream sauce and served around riced potatoes. To one cupful of cream sauce add two tablespoonfuls of finely chopped pepper. One quart of potatoes are washed, pared, boiled and put through the ricer or fruit press on to center of hot plate, the creamed chicken around the edge. Sprinkle the potatoes with cut parsley and dust with paprika. The chicken can be served on toast and the potatoes separate.

Covered Eggs.—Make a paste with one cupful of fine white breadcrumbs, one beaten egg, two tablespoonfuls of minced ham or other cold meats and enough milk to moisten. Line buttered cups with this mixture and drop an egg from its shell into the center. Bake or steam until the eggs are firm. All the better if the yolk is hard. Loosen from the cup and turn each out on a small square of buttered toast. This quantity is sufficient for four to six eggs.

Hot Cheese Sandwiches.—One roll snappy cheese, one egg well beaten, one tablespoonful Worcestershire sauce, one-fourth teaspoonful salt, one-fourth teaspoonful mustard, bacon, rounds of bread. Cream the cheese, add the egg and seasoning and spread on the bread, which should be cut about a half inch thick. Place a slice of bacon on each round and bake a few minutes in a quick oven till the bacon is done. Serve with a green salad.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

LIVER HASH.

LUNCHEON MENU.
Liver Hash.
Watercress. Graham Bread Toast.
Baked Rhubarb With Strawberries. Tea.

LIVER Hash.—One pint of liver, chopped coarse and measured after chopping. In frying pan melt one tablespoonful of butter, add one teaspoonful of flour and blend well. Now add one cupful of water gradually, while stirring, and season with salt and pepper. Stir in the liver and simmer for twenty minutes. Just before serving add one teaspoonful of lemon juice.

Creamed Cabbage.—Chop fine one small cabbage, cook one hour, or until it begins to turn dark, seasoning with salt, pepper and plenty of butter. Before removing from fire sprinkle with one scant tablespoonful flour; add cream to make a smooth sauce.

Grapefruit In Glasses.—If one possesses the glasses made especially for grapefruit, the pulp of the fruit is removed in spoonfuls and put into the small inside cups, the cracked ice filling the space between them and the other edge of the glass. A little sugar is added to the fruit if desired, and the whole is "topped off" by two maraschino cherries. If one hasn't the glasses, the fruit should be chilled and put in spoonfuls into the empty shells. Serve the grapefruit shells on small plates, with either orange or grapefruit spoons.

Egg Toast a la Armenia.—Six or eight slices bread, dry and toasted. Milk, a cupful. Eggs, three or four. Butter, in quantity required for frying. Sugar to taste. Dampen the dry bread with milk and after dipping into the beaten egg fry in smoking hot butter on both sides. Some prefer only eggs and omit milk; others use milk with eggs beaten in, but the results are similar. Serve with sugar or sirup if desired.

Fairy Cream Cake.—Two cupfuls sugar, two-thirds cupful butter, one cupful milk, two and three-fourths cupfuls flour, one-fourth cupful cornstarch, three even teaspoonfuls baking powder, whites of seven eggs, vanilla to taste. Cream butter, add sugar, beating well, then eggs, flour with cornstarch and baking powder. This makes two cakes.

Orange Drops.—Grate rind of one orange and squeeze out juice, taking care to reject seeds; add to this a pinch of tartaric acid; then stir in confectioners' sugar until it is stiff enough to form into balls the size of a small marble. This is delicious candy. The same process for lemon drops, using lemons in place of oranges.

LA TENA'S SHOWS DREW CROWDS

Both Performances at Athletic Field Were Well Attended---Young and Old Satisfied.

Large crowds featured the afternoon performance of La Tena's big three-ring wild animal circus at the old athletic grounds. All who attended it seemed to bes atisfied that the production had been most meritorious and the full value of their money had been given them in the many varied and interesting feature acts now with the show. From start to finish the show interested and entertained, as well as instructed the large crowd present in all the wild animal life, concerning which so many of us have to depend upon books and pictures for our only information. A most interesting thing to notice was the interest of all, young and old, in the many different acts which seemed to hold the attention of the aged patriarch with the same facility as that of the children, many of whom were attending their first show.

As each act upon the program left amid a new act came forth to meet the same cordial endorsement and and not even a murmur of disapproval was heard at any act on the long program one could not but feel that the immense audience was exceedingly pleased with the show. Its acts, its performers and the courteous treatment which the management gave to all its patrons. Although this was the second show at Fulton this year we are sure that no better reception will be given to any circus than that which was given to this show. If this show should see fit to come back to Fulton for a future date there is no doubt that a large attendance would be given and the tents found all too small to accommodate the larget crowds that would desire to attend.

Among the many special acts of merit at this show may be mentioned Margarette's Nubian Lions, among which is a large male lion that goes through his part of the performance with apparent liking but who has his ever watchful eyes constantly on his mistress and on the door of the cage as if he were hoping that one day he may be free again. This den of trained beasts is only one of the many big features with the circus and among others may be mentioned Balchman's remarkably clever bears, Captain [illegible]'s educated seals, Paul Allen's [illegible] trained elephants and Sylvester's dancing ponies. Among the many performances on horseback is the splendid novelty presented by Blanche Reed and Herman Griggs. Another act of real merit was presented by the Albert Powell troupe of distinguished wire artists, five in number, who gave a very high grade act upon the tight wire. Over a hundred performers, the show carries 20 clowns alone, take part in a show which far variety and cleverness and the price of admission, ranks high among the wild animal shows of America.

A very pleasing and novel sideshow was also carried as an added attraction to the big show. And here for a moderate sum were shown a number of features which are not presented even with the larger and more pretentious shows. Nor was the entertainment objectionable even to the most fastidiously correct of its large audiences. It was a clean, talented and worth while exhibition.

In spite of the large crowds and the fact that nine-tenths of the audience always undertake to come into the show about five minutes after the time when thes how is billed to start, the visitor was struck forcibly with the courteous and gentlemanly manner in which the employees of the show cared for every want of their patrons and seemed to be making a special effort to please each individual patron. Another matter that deserves praise was that thes how was started promptly at that time nor at any time during the long program [illegible] after.

Commissioner Wiltsie May Be Ousted From Office

In an interview at 4 o'clock this afternoon, Mayor Fox told a reporter for the Times that Commissioner A. W, Wiltsie could be removed from the Board of Public Works whether he resigned or not, if the members of the board felt it necessary to ask his resignation.

According to the Mayor, Mr. Wiltsie sold Edward Styring, the contractor who is erecting the bridge over the Hunter race and Waterhouse creek, a quantity of tile, for use in constructing the bridges, and thereby was guilty of a violation of the charter which prohibits any commissioner from furnishing or selling materials to any con tractor engaged in city work. Mayor Fox would not say whether or not he intended to remove Commissioner Wiltsie on these charges, but did aver that City Attorney Fanning had given an opinion to the effect that the commissioner could be removed on these grounds.

British Lose Thousands, Gaining Ground of Little Value In Comparison

Berlin, Sept. 2.—via Sayville—Nearly all the British troops landed at Sulva Bay on Aug. 6 and 7 have been put out of action.

Thousands of dead bodies remain unburied.

Their total losses are estimated at over 500 officers and 55,000 men.

More than 20,000 British soldiers were killed in the general offensive coincident with the Anafarta landing.

The morale of the allied troops is reported badly shaken. Disease is spreading among them. The Turkish losses have been large, but the troops remain jubilant. Their bravery has been unequalled. Constantinople is decorated with bunting.

The facts are gleaned from reports given out today, by the Overseash News Agency, and from dispatches received from correspondents on Galliopoli.

Five infantry and one cavalry division, a total of 100,000 men, were landed at Sulva Bay under protection of gunfire from the warships.

The southern group attacked the Turkish centere and left wing. They failed completely to gain any ground and suffered fearful losses.

The northern group used the British Avi Burnu positions as a base. They succeeded in pressing back the right wings of the Turks, but reinforcements were hurriedly brought up and the British were thrown back.

Subsequently the latter succeeded in again pressing back the Turks and extending their positions. The new position, however, was in the form of a semi-circle, with the Turks occupying the heights surrounding it. It was enfiladed by Turkish fire.

General Sir Ian Hamilton, in personal command of the landing force, hesitated to withdraw his troops and admit the fearful defeat. The French generals had strongly advised against the selection of Anafarta as a base, but Sir Ian overruled them.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE

News Mostly of a Political Nature From the Nation's Seat of Government for Times' Readers.

Washington, Sept. 2., (Special Correspondence).—Among the many important pieces of constructive legislation to the credit of the Republican party is the act for the construction of the Panama Canal. Although that measure was not passed by a party vote, it was passed by a Republican Congress, signed by a Republican President, and made easily practicable by Republican legislation and administration.

The Republican party had declared in its platform for the construction of an "Isthmian Canal." The Democratic party had declared for, a "Nicaraguan Canal." The difference merely serves to illustrate the broader view taken by the Republican party.

It is noteworthy that when the canal bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives, on Jan. 7, 1902, Representative Davis (Dem.) of Florida, declared:

"Our National Treasury is bursting with a surplus of unneeded dollars."

Mr. Davis was arguing in favor of the canal and gave this as one reason why the act should be passed. It is hardly necessary to add the comment that there never was a Democratic administration when this argument could have been put up in favor of so large an undertaking. Subsequent events prove that notwithstanding Panama Canal construction was undertakenu nder acts which authorized issuance of bonds, the continued supremacy of Republican policies maintained sufficient revenue to construct that canall argely from current income, and the only urgent demand for the issuance of canal bonds has come after the canal has been completed and in order to make up a deficit created by a Democratic administration at a time when no extraordinary expenditures are being made.

Prudent persons who are looking to the ultimate consequences of the Wilson policy in Mexico are wondering whether the six Latin-American countries now involved in the business will be willing to quit. The plain English of the matter is that Mr. Wilson has asked some of the South American republics to interfere in the matters of North America. Before the Wilson era they had never thought it any province of theirs to interfere north of the Isthmus. France came over to Mexico and the United States threw her out. The South American republics have been organized into a combination by President Wilson to interfere in matters affecting our boundaries. The idea, apparently is that the United States shall not protect its citizens, or their property, or even national honor unless we have the advice and consent of six foreign Goyernments. Some day—not so far dis distant, either—we shall have an Administration at Washington which will not hold to this idea. Then what? Shall we then bec onfronted by the hostile array of the Latin-American States whom Wilson has taken into partnership?

Henry Watterson seeks to excuse Wilson. "President Taft," he says, "left the Mexican question to President Wilson." And the latter, we may add, evidently plans to leave it to his successor in a much more complicated form than when he got it.

The President is now said to have a plan in mind for the relief of the Southern cotton planter by governmental agency. Has he also in mind a similar plan for thhe Northern lumberman?

CHINA'S PRESIDENT MAY WEAR CROWN

Yuan Shih Kai Thinking of Proclaiming Himself Emperor.

GOODNOW INDORSES PLAN.

American Who Is Legal Adviser to the Government Cites Reasons Why It Is Better to Have a Monarchy In That Country—Nation Became a Republic In 1912—News Creates Sensation.

The project of proclaiming himself emperor is now being discussed by Yuan Shih Kai, president of the Chinese republic, with his immediate supporters and Professor Frank Johnson Goodnow of Johns Hopkins university, legal adviser to the Chinese government, who is spending the summer in Peking.

Professor Goodnow, who secured the confidence of Yuan Shih Kai by advice given during former critical times, has been consulted on this question since his arrival in Peking not long ago, and it is learned that he approves the project.

Says Conditions Differ.

The news became public by the publication of accounts of the formation by several prominent men of an association for the purpose of discussing whether a monarchy is not the better form of government for China. The published article telling of the formation of the society quotes Professor Goodnow as declaring that for China a monarchy is a better form of government than a republic and that "conditions are different in China and America, and it is impossible to transplant a system from one country to another."

It was learned from one of Yuan Shih Kai's immediate supporters that if the project proved feasible the plan is to establish the monarchy within two years.

Goodnow Invited to Peking.

It is stated that Professor Goodnow was asked to come to Peking and that soon after his arrival Yuan Shih Kai consulted with him on the question of a permanent constitution and broached the question of a monarchy. The arguments of Yuan's supporters, it is declared, persuaded Professor Goodnow that a monarchy should be established if the people would accept it, and Professor Goodnow drafted a document for Yuan, advising him on the method of establishing a monarchy.

In the announcement of the project, which is made to appear as coming from a group of leading citizens, Professor Goodnow is quoted extensively as a great authority advocating the necessity for a monarchy. This pronouncement says:

"As Professor Goodnow is a citizen of a republic, he is more competent to make such a statement than others."

Professor Goodnow said he had made no blanket statement that a monarchy was better than a republic, but said that under certain conditions such as apply in China he believes a monarchy would be better.

Danger of Chaos Is Cited.

The foremost arguments of the monarchists is the danger of chaos reigning as in Mexico at Yuan Shih Kai's death. The succession of Vice President L Yuan Yang, who was the nation's hero in the anti-Manchu revolution, but who has been a prisoner on an island in the Winter palace grounds the past two years, would, it is declared, be unsatisfactory to some of Yuan Shih Kai's immediate supporters because it is asserted they would be unable to control him.

Yuan Shih Kai's eldest son is a partial invalid owing to an injury to his head sustained in being thrown from his horse, while his other sons are unimportant youths.

It is believed that the project will be consummated more or less speedily unless dangerous objection is displayed throughout the country, which is considered unlikely because the press is largely controlled by the government and the people apparently are willing to accept any government which will give them a period of peace.

Became Republic In 1912.

China became a republic Feb. 12, 1912, upon the abdication of the Emperor Kwang Seu, following the revolution of the previous year. A provisional constitution, formulated by the revolutionary government of Nanking, was accepted and under this a provisional parliament met in Peking April 8, 1913.

A permanent constitution was drafted and the articles dealing with the election and term of office of president and vice president were passed by parliament. Under these Yuan Shih Kai, Oct. 6, was elected president for a five year term.

TO EXCHANGE UNFIT CAPTIVES.

England and Germany Also Agree to Civilians' Repatriation.

The English foreign office has announced that agreements had been reached with the German government regarding the repatriation of civilians unfit for military service and the further exchange of incapacitated prisoners of war monthly after October.

The decision as to the unfitness and incapacity in each case is to rest entirely with the government holding the prisoner and each case is to be judged on its merits.

METEOR'S DASH WAS A BRILLIANT EXPLOIT

Germans, Hemmed In, Escaped on a Norse Merchantman.

Berlin.—The story of a naval exploit which matches in daring the spectacular rovings of the Emden, the Prince Eitel and other German commerce destroyers was told when the details of the sinking of the German auxiliary Meteor were received.

After an adventurous dash in the North sea the captain of the Meteor, hemmed in by enemy patrol boats, succeeded in escaping with his crew and British prisoners aboard a commandeered merchant craft after he blew up his own vessel.

"According to private reports," says a news agency, "the Meteor, a converted merchant steamer, succeeded in breaking through the lines of British patrol ships and traveling to the Orkney islands, 550 miles from her base. She laid a large number of mines and destroyed British merchant ships.

"Finally she encountered the British cruiser Ramsey, which she sank after a splendid maneuver. The captain of the Meteor, whose crew consisted of about twenty-five men, saved and captured forty-three men from the Ramsey. About sixty others were drowned.

"British battle cruisers, notified by wireless, pursued the Meteor. After the Meteor had burned the Danish merchantman Jason, with a contraband cargo aboard, the little German craft, facing four British cruisers, stopped a Norwegian steamer, transferred the captured British contraband crew and also put the Danish sailors on board. This boat escaped from her pursuers with the captured Englishmen. The Meteor was sunk by exploding her mines."

People Lose Case Against Ft. Stanwix on Technical Point

The constitutionality of the State Labor laws restricting the hours of employment of women was again questioned successfully yesterday in City Court when the jury in the case of the State Labor Department vs. The Fort Stanwix Canning Co. of this city returned a verdict of not guilty after only four minutes of deliberation. This was the second instance in two days in which the canning company obtained a favorable verdict in cases of Labor law violations brought against them by the state. In Rome, on Wednesday Howard C. Wiggins, attorney for the company and Edward Quigley, of New York, attorney for the State Department, tried a case on the same charges and the company was declared not guilty by the municipal court jury.

The cases here grew out of charges preferred by Frank S. Nash, state inspector, against the company involving the employment of Mrs. Hattie Loungley of 172 West 4th st. and Mrs. Mary Hegman of 12 Austin avenue, after 10 o'clock at night during the rush of the pea canning season here in July. By mutual consent, thev erdict of the jury in the case of Mrs. Loungley was allowed to stand for both cases.

The State Department proved that Mrs. Loungley was working at the plant after midnight on the night of July 23 and that she had worked after 10 o'clock at night and before 6 o'clock in the morning on several occasions. The letter of the law reads that no woman shall be employed in any factory in New York state after 10 o'clock at night and before 6 o'clock in the morning, and the employment of women during the prohibited period constitutes a misdeanor. The canning company claims this law does not apply to canneries and as attorneys for neither side had records of any similar cases or decisions of higher courts on cannery cases establishing a precedent, Judge Wilson decided to allow the jurors to decide both on the law and the facts, as Judge Baker did in Rome Wednesday.

The State attorney claims the Court of Appeals has established the constitutionality of the law by a decision rendered in a cast against a laundry company, charged with employing a woman after hours. Mr. Wiggins, attorney for the company contends that this decision only established the constitutionality of the law in that specific case or in the case of other laundries, and that the court rendered that decision principally because it was proven that laundry work was harmful.

Mr. Wiggins occupied almost an hour in explaining the points of law involved in the case and in showing that the law was unconstitutional in that it interfered with the rights of individuals to m contracts for their labor and abrogated the inalienable rights of a free adult to work when he or she so willed. It was evident when the talesmen for the jury were being examined that the jurors leaned toward the company's side of the case, most of them deeming it an injustice to prevent the employment of anyone who was willing to work, particularly in these times.

In summing up, Mr. Quigley simply stated the law to the jurors and told them the laws were made to be obeyed and that an exception for canneries would mean exceptions in all industries. While Mr. Quigley admitted that the night employment of Mrs. Loungley had r o injurious effect upon Mrs, Loungley's health, he said the law had been made for all women and that eminent physicians were of the opinion that night labor was certain to affect the health of a woman.

Augustus Wettengel, a former Fultonian, now a resident of

Rome, and secretary for the company, testified at the trial yesterday, and with Mr. Wiggins expressed an opinion regarding the labor law yesterday afternoon after the jury had returned a verdict for the company.

"In almost every state in the Union where they have laws restricting the hours of labor for women," said Mr. Wettengel, "an exception is made in a case of emergency for canning factories. There is no exception under the letter of the law for this state, but the verdicts returned in these cases convince us that there should be. It is unreasonable to try top revent a man from saving his property from destruction and to try to prevent people from working if they are willing to do it."

OUDERKIRK'S SWAP, LIKE PROVERBIAL CAT, CAME BACK; NOW HE IS WISE

James Outerkirk, an employe of James Murphy, near Fairdale, says he is "off" the practise of swapping horses with circus men. James arrived at this decision yesterday after he had been "David-Harumed" by some of the horse-owners with the local show.

Outerkirk brought his pony to the show yesterday with the intention of making a dicker if he saw any good horse on the lot, and a small wiry saddle horse caught his eye. He swapped with the circus man after a long argument, but was warned that the horse he received would not stay with him. Outerkirk, well-pleased with his bargain, said he would take his chances and rode his new find out to Fairdale. Just after supper he wanted to smoke and he saddled the pony and started for the corner store. He left the horse standing outside while he went in to make a purchase and when he came out the horse had started for Fulton and the circus on a dead run.

The horse arrived at the circus ground and sought out his place in the horse tent, where he was discovered by his former owner. The circus man did not know Outerkirk's address and was wondering what to do, when Outerkirk arrived. Convinced that he could not keep the horse, Outerkirk called the swap off and left for his home with his own pony.

CARDINAL GIBBONS SAYS AUSTRIA-HUNGARY READY TO ENTERTAIN PEACE

Cardinal Gibbons returned to Baltimore last night from Washington, where he called on President Wilson with a message from Pope Benedict. The Cardinal confined his comment on the call to a brief statement isued soon after his arrival. The statement follows:

"I visited the President today and delivered a communication from the Vatican at Rome, and under instructions from there I cannot discuss the nature of the contents.

"This communication reached me on last Monday while I was visiting Mr. C. Herbert Shriver, in Carroll county, and I immediately returned to the city and made arrangements to visit the President."

Cardinal Gibbons, when he left the White House yesterday afternoon, had a smiling greeting for the newspaper reporters.

"Our talk was highly satisfactory, and I am very much pleased with my reception from the President," he told the reporters. "We went over the entire situation, but I cannot reveal the details of our conversation at this time. Probably more will be made public in the near future."

Equal Rights for Jewish People to Be Demanded

A Washington dispatch says that well informed diplomatic circles report the terms which Germany is willing to consider peace proposals are as follows:

The establishment of Poland into an independent Kingdom, to be comprised of all Russian Palond, a part of Austrian Palond and a small part of German Poland.

Absolute freedom of the seas, established through a new international declaration of rights to which all maritime Powers shall be signatory. Germany will agree never again to establish a submarine blockade. England to agree never again to make the North Sea a tributary water.

Co-equal rights and liberties for Jews in all lands guaranteed by all signatories to any treaty of peace.

Bessarabia, now Russian territory on the Black Sea, to bec eded to Rumania.

Austria-Hungary to be given a dominating influence in the Balkan States.

Belgium to be restored and her sovereignty and future neutrality guaranteed.

All French territory held by Germany to be restored to France.

That portion of Alsace held by France to remain a part of the German Empire.

All German colonies seized during the war to be restored.

An indemnity to reimburse Germany for the cost of her military operations.

Settlement of Submarine Issue Opens Way to Pope's Peace Plan

Washington, Sept. 3.—The general impression in Washington today that the only real importance of the Pope's message is the semi-official information it contained that Austria and Germany will welcome peace overtures from the Allies. This information was gladly received by President Wilson and he instructed the Cardinal to send his thanks to Pope Benedict and his assurances that the United States as well as the Catholic Church earnestly desired a cessation of hostilities.

It is well recognized here that before any suggestion of a peace discussion comes from the Entente Allies they must themselves agree on the subject. Stress was laid on this phase of the matter tonight by persons in close touch with the British Embassy.

Not News to Washington

The importance of the information that Germany and Austria are willing to talk peace at the moment when they have reached the height of their successes lies only in the fact that it was conveyed in this rather formal way by Cardinal Gibbons from the Pope. It is not news to President Wilson nor the Allies.

Ever since Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, sent his message to Mr. Lansing asking the United States to reserve judgment on the Arabic case until more information was at hand, and expressing regret at the loss of American lives, hints have been thrown out by the Embassy here and German sources throughout the United States, as well as in Berlin, that the settlement of the submarine issue between the United States and Germany would open the way for a peace discussion.

It seems quite apparent that Germany is trying to manoeuvre this country into a position where it will take upon itself the burden of again offering mediation to the Allies. If the Allies should refuse to accept mediation at this time, Germany, it is said, then would try to place the blame of further continuance of the war on them, and endeavor to use this situation to influence public

Wiltsie Promises Revelations; Can't Be Budged, He Says

Commissioner A. W. Wiltsie of the Board of Public Works admitted this morning to a reporter for the Times that he had been asked by Mayor Fox to resign from the Board, and that he had sold Edward Styring, a contractor engaged in city work, a quantity of tile pipe, a technical violation of the city charter. In spite of this fact. Mr. Wiltsie said he would not resign until the First st. paving matter was settled and that he doubted very much if the Mayor and other members of the Board of Public Works would attempt to force him out.

"I talked with Mayor Fox Tuesday afternoon," said Mr. Wiltsie, "and the Mayor did ask me to resign. I told the Mayor I would resign but not until this paving fight is finished. Don't mistake me there. I did not tell the Mayor I would resign now and I certainly will not resign until they settle this paving question.

"The Mayor asked me to resign because I could not get along with Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Garrett and because my opinions favor the opposition on this paving question and I would assist them to fight it. I told him my views and before he left I said I didn't care anything about the commissioner-ship after this question had been settled, but until that time I would not quit.

"Did you sell pipe or tile to Edward Styring? the reportor asked.

"The firm of Gilbert and Nichols sold some pipe to Mr. Styring" answered Mr. Wiltsie, "I did not have anything to do with the deal personally. I want to deny right here that I ever solicited that business or cared anything about getting it. We sold Mr. Styring pipe amounting to $10.04. He got his main supply elsewhere, but he was [illegible] for a few pieces and we accommodated him."

"That constitutes a violation of the charter, does it not?" Mr. Wiltsie was asked.

"Yes, I suppose it does. But none of those fellows can start anything against me for that;" the Commissioner replied. "I am prepared to fight removal and if they attempt to remove me, several things will come to light that these men won't relish.

"The Mayor told me that Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Garrett had tendered their resignations to him to take effect unless I would resign. Well, I won't resign, that's final."

"Mr. Wiltsie said he had received no notice of the next meeting of the Board of Public Works and had not seen Mayor Fox since Tuesday. When asked if he knew that the Mayor had gone to Albany, as rumored this morning, Mr. Wiltsie said he didn't know and didn't care.

J. W. Stevenson could not be located at noon today and it is rumored that he has also gone to Albany with the Mayor.

"Have you resigned yet?" Commissioner Garrett was asked this morning.

"I'll let you know when I do," said the Commissioner.

GAGE AND MASON BACKED FOR PAVING BOARD; NEW PETITION AT CITY HALL

A petition signed by a majority of the property-owners along East First st., nominating Fred A. Gage and George E. Mason as their representatives on the Paving Board, which will supervise the construction of the paving of First st, between Rochester st. and Broadway, has been filed with City Clerk Scudder. The petition is signed by Almon Bristol; O. C. Breed, Catherine H. Parsons, William MacNamara, Mary L. Mead, Charles R. Lee, T. W. Webb and I Achilli as trustees of the Citizen's club; Edward Quirk, F. A. Gage, F. C. Wolever, G. E. Mason, E. M. French and Harriet Nelson.

In a communication to the Board of Public Works, Messrs. Webb, Achilli, Quirk and French, withdrew their names from the petition nominating Fred A. Gage and James W. Bogue. F. C. Wolever also wrote the Board that he wished his name withdrawn from the Gage-Bogue petition. The filing of this new petition practically insures the appointment of Mr. Gage and Mr. Mason to the Paving Board.

"Freedom" in Marketing

The writer of this had some peaches for which he wanted to find a market. He reasoned that peaches being a good article of food, and there being a couple of millions ofh ungry people in Chicago, it would be a fine thing if he could ship to that point and sell to the push-cart men who vend peaches on the streets. So he had an investigation made to see what the prospects would be. The man who made the investigation knows all the ins and outs of the marketing business, and is in fact a dealer in farm products in Chicago.

"I find," says his report, "that even if a good run on the railway could be secured for your peaches into Chicago the trouble would arise in getting your cars properly 'spotted' on the tracks in Chicago—that is, in getting them properly placed for unloading on the railway.

"There is such a ramification of tracks here that a dollar or two slipped by interested parties to the brakeman or switchman would be sufficient to have the cars marooned on some remote switch, among hundreds of other cars, and by the time the head officials could be seen and the matter straightened out the peaches would be pulp."

Speaking of regulation, it would seem that here is a matter which might well be looked to. Peaches marooned on a remote side track for the purpose of destroying them by decay will not do much to cut down the high cost of living in the cities, nor add to the cost of high living on the part of the farmer. Aside from its being af orm of highway robbery, it stands between demand and supply.

"I find," says the report, "that this has happened time and again in cases where independents have shipped to Chicago or other large cities.

"Then I find that push-cart men and hucksters, while otherwise ready and willing to buy peaches from the car, would be afraid to do so for fear that they could not make their regular purchases of commission men if it were found out that they were buying direct from producers. So you see it is the old, old question."

It is a reign of terror, you see, as well as a hold-up.

We need free markets.

It is indeed the old, old question. The grain men had to solve it when elevators refused toh andle their grain unless it was bought through the combination of country elevators. And they have not finished solving it yet, after nearly twenty years of struggle The co-operative elevator companies had to solve it in the case of lumber when the lumber combine killed off one effort after another on the part of thef armers to buy from mills, from jobbers, or from anyone on earth who had lumber for sale. The farmers' concerns wereb randed as outlaw concerns when whatever there was of outlawry was on the part of the illegal combines which were taking toll of everything the farmers grew.

The middleman is a necessity. But the middleman who organizes to compel shipments to him and his fellows is a menace to the producer and the consumer. —Farm & Fireside.

SOUTH AMERICA BORROWS FROM NEIGHBOR

New York.—It was learned yesterday that J. P. Morgan & Co., in furtherance of the general plans of the bankers of this country to finance the needs of the South American countries on a larger scale, have extended credit to Chili of more than $6,000,000. It was also understood that negotiations are also under way which may lead to further extensions of credit to this country by this firm and other American bankers. Included among these is the guaranty Trust Company, which has just loaned $500,000 to the Santiago Water Company, the principal and interest being guaranteed by the Chilian government.

A NAME FAMILIAR—"QUITE GONE"

To run a city like a business is remindful of the moral in one of the fairy tales by Grimm, who tells of the cat and the mouse. The two became fast friends and the mouse consented to live with the cat. That they might not be short of rations in winter time they procured a jar full of fat, but could not tell where to place it for safety. Finally the jar was placed under the altar in the church. Soon the cat longed to taste the contents of the jar, so she made an excuse to leave the home—alone. She went straight to the church crept to the jar and began to lick, licked the top off. In the evening she returned to the home and the mouse. The cat reported that she had attended the christening of a child, and when the mouse asked the child's name the cat replied, "Top-off." Not long after this the cat felt a desire to pay another visit to the church—alone. She gave as an excuse another christening. The cat slipped into the church and devoured half the contents of the jar. "Nothing so good as what one eats by oneself," she said, and she felt pleased with her day's work. When she returned home, the mouse inquired the name of the child. "Half-gone," said the cat. In a short time the cat's mouth watered for another visit to the jar. She told of another or third child that had been born. The mouse commented upon the singular names of the other children—"Top-off" and "Half-gone," but did not insist upon accompanying the cat to the church. The greedy cat went alone to the church and emptied the jar entirely. "When all is gone," said she, "then one has peace." At nightfall she returned home, satisfied and sleek. The mouse asked immediately what name the third child had received. "This will not please you more than the other," said the cat; "it is called Quite-gone." Mousie went to sleep, but not before wondering what "Quite-gone" meant.

After this no more executive sessions were held in the church. Winter approached and provisions became scarce. The mouse thought of her store, and said, "Come, we will go to our jar that we have been saving; we shall enjoy our feast." "Certainly," replied the cat. They went to the church and found the empty jar. The mouse understood. She accused the cat of devouring all—first the top off, then half gone, then—. "Will you be silent?" cried the cat; "another word and I devour you too." But the poor mouse had already said too much. She had "quite gone" on her tongue; scarcely were the words uttered, than the cat made a spring upon her and mousey was in the same relative position as the city whose bonded indebtedness is $612,651.75, and no ready market for city bonds.

It must be that the jar of fat is "quite gone."

Vital Importance of Weight Standards

By Chas. Quinn, City Sealer, Buffalo, N. Y.

The question of weights and measures and the problems which the people of the United States have to contend with without their knowledge or perhaps their appreciation is one which is of vital importance. I believe congress should jump into the breach and do the needful in legislating a uniform weight for every known carrier or measure universally used. For instance, a bushel of onions in some states is accredited as weighing about 53 pounds, while in other states the weight is classified as about 59 pounds. The hardship consists in the fact that farmers may ship commodities to one state from another, and where they ship hundreds of bushels of vegetables at a stated weight the consignee has but to pay for the weight estimated by the state in which he resides.

A carload of onions may weigh accurately so much in one state, but when the consignee of another state has to pay for it the weight of the bushel in that jurisdiction may be more or less, as the case may be.

Every known measure should have a uniform weight all over the United States, and a barrel of potatoes should be judged as to have as much weight in New York as in California. But this condition does not exist.

Then, again, all grain hoppers should be tested at stated intervals. Buffalo's port has shipments of grain amounting to 300,000,000 bushels annually, and the weights often vary to an alarming extent because the hopper in Minnesota or elsewhere is out of kilter. Who pays the difference? Why, the poor consumer, of course.

This is a situation that cannot be too forcibly impressed upon congress to afford a remedy.

The Omelette Souffle

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

THERE is a vast distinction between distribution for the sake of increasing the circulation figures and distribution for the sake of increasing the number of advertising responses.

There is a difference between a circulation which strikes the same reader several times in the same day and the circulation which does not repeat the individual. There is a difference between circulation which is concentrated into an area from which every reader can be expected to come to your establishment, if you can interest him, and a circulation that spreads over half a dozen states and shows its greatest volume in territory so far from your establishment that you can't get a buyer out of ten thousand readers.

You've got to weigh and measure all these things when you weigh and measure circulation figures. It isn't the number of copies printed, but the number of copies sold—not the number of papers distributed, but the number of papers distributed in responsive territory—not the number of readers reached, but the number of readers who have the price to buy what you want to sell—that determine the value of circulation to you.

You can take a single egg and whip it into an omelette souffle which seems to be a whole plateful, but the extra bulk is just hot air and sugar—the change in form has not increased the amount of egg substance and it's the substance in circulation, just as it is the nutrition in the egg, that counts.

THOSE "FOREIGN WOMEN"

Jane Addams has no fear of the foreign women's vote. No part of her recent address in Boston aroused more interest than this.

"I have lived for more than twenty-five years with foreign women," said Miss Addams, "and I assure you that they are just like American women. Among them there are bright women and stupid women, and all kinds; but they are all interested in the schools and the hospitals, and in things which are to benefit the city.

"I was a judge of election last spring in the precinct where Hull House stands. Almost all the voters were foreigners; and it was a great satisfaction to me to see what good judgment the women showed. There was one Irishwoman, veryb right, who could not read, and therefore I was allowed to go into the booth with her to help her mark her ballot. The first proposition was about bonds for a new hospital. The Irishwoman said, 'Is the same bunch to spend the money that run the hospital we have now? Then I'm against it.' The next proposition was about a subway; the next about a hospital for contagious cases, and so on. There were ten propositions to be acted upon. I was scrupulous not to influence her yet on nine of them she voted from her own common sense, just as the Municipal League and the City Club had recommended as the result of painstaking research. It reminded me of what John Morley said—that the elector is not expected to be an expert, but to express the mind of the common people, and that the most valuable voter is the person who knows most about social misery and the ways in which it can be mitigated. Any woman who gives her best mind to itc an vote intelligently on such questions as are placed before the people. They are really simple questions. Of course, she must look into the matter. To do things intelligently is a sine qua non of successful living.

"Italian women came in to vote who knew much more about our city than their husbands, who were away digging railroads during six or nine months of the year. Foreign women often have good practical ideas. Italian women have come to Hull House in the past to ask for municipal wash houses. They said, quite truly, that the kitchen of a tiny tenement is no place to wash. Russian women have come to urge us to try to get covered markets. They said that even in the ghettos of Russia food was not allowed to be so exposed to dust and dirt as in Chicago."—By A. S. B.

AUTO TIRES MAY BE SHIPPED BY POST

Another crimp has been put in the express business by the government parcel post by the increasing of the size of packages that the government will carry. If you have an automobile tire that you want to send, tie it up in paper and send it to its destination. Hitherto they have been rejected by the mails but the new rules permit their being carried. There is one rule that must be adhered to, however. This one is that it must be a tire only and not have a wheel or an automobile attached.

Under the new rules which went into effect the size of the package that may be sent through the mails has been increased from 72 inches in length and girth to 84 inches in length and girth. This will work to the advantage of many shippers andg ive them a much wider range in sending packages by parcel post.

FUNNY MOVIE RESTORED SPEECH AND HEARING

London.—Robert Beck of Chicago, who was made deaf and dumb by an injury while fighting with the British army, suddenly recovered his speech and hearing yesterday. Beck, who was a motorcycle policeman on the Chicago force when the war began, became a dispatch bearer with the British troops, and was struck down by a sniper's bullet in Flanders. He was taken to Liverpool.

From the day of his injury he had been unable to hear or speak until he was taken with other convalescents to a moving picture entertainment in Liverpool. While watching a comic picture he suddenly burst out in laughter. The next moment he found he was able to talk and hear normally.

"TRAVELECTRIC" WANTS JOKES, ETC. FOR READERS

Have you literary ability? Then try your hand at writing stories, jokes and poems that those who trolleyride over the Empire United lines may read as they travel. "Travelectric" is the name of a magazine issued by the railway company and the September number just out makes the announcement that persons of literary ability may thorough the magazine columns air their ability to write short stories, poems and jokes.

A column each month is to be devoted to short stories or poems, according to the editors of the publication.

"Suggestions for improvement of the service on any of the lines covered by the publication will also be considered for reading matter in the folder. Stories of the "human interest" order humorous tales with a point or moral and "anything along the line of good, clean reading" will be given space in turn, and the writer will be given credit for his work.

LEWIS COUNTY MAN FINDS GOLD IN ROCKS

Gold has been discovered in the town of Diana, Lewis County, according to a claim filed with Secretary of State Francis M. Hugo by Nathan L. Dike, a resident of that section. The claim reads: "Take notice that this day Nathan Dike has found gold in the rocks on or near the south line of the old Barber farm in the town of Diana." The dimensions of the claim are set fort, a $1 bill accompanying the communication to the Secretary of State.

HOME TOWN HELPS

NEED FOR CAREFUL PLANNING

Adornment of Either Large or Small Areas Should Be Made Matter of Careful Consideration.

The first essential in the adornment of a home area is the formation of a suitable plan. In making this plan the principal things to be considered are the size of the area, the amount which the owner feels able to expend for the purpose, the climatic conditions, the soil, the exposure, the peculiarities of the site, and the style of treatment, whether formal or natural.

Small places, consisting of an acre or less, situated amongst others of like dimensions, can only be appropriately improved in a formal style. On the other hand, large suburban places or country seats should, in order to maintain unity and harmony with their surroundings, be treated in the natural style.

It is impossible to develop a forest, a park, or even a grove on an area less than an acre in extent; and it is equally impossible to maintain fountains, terraces, sheared trees, hedges, and carpet bedding over an area of several acres.

Before a tree or shrub is placed in its permanent location an outline map of the area to be treated should be made. This map should locate all existing structures, indicate the direction in which most pleasing outlooks are to be had, and also the contour of the ground to be beautified. The aim should be to hide by means of trees and shrubbery all objectionable buildings or portions of the place, and also to shut from view all unsightly objects maintained by neighbors.

To harmoniously arrange trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants, and at the same time adjust them to the contour of the place, to the architecture of the buildings, and to the convenience of the walks and drives, is the aim of the landscape gardener. Every successful attempt to adorn a city lot, a suburban place, or a park has a valuable influence upon the community in which it is situated. It furnishes an object lesson which others will attempt to follow, and in this way it serves the useful purpose of stimulating in others a love for the beautiful in nature.

NEWSPAPER HAS RIGHT IDEA

Omaha Bee Points Out Necessity for Preserving Civic Improvements When Once Made.

Why not put the stress on "keeping" instead of "making" Omaha a city beautiful? We have a beautiful, a very beautiful city, as, of course, our "city beautiful" advocates realize. Omaha is made beautiful in the first place by its natural topography, its broad, well laid-out, paved and richly shaded streets; its attractive homes and their artistic surroundings and its lovely parks.

The combined efforts of public authorities and private citizens to promote the beauty and attractiveness of the city are indeed commendable, but for the sake of doing ourselves full justice and avoiding false impressions abroad, would it not be better to emphasize the idea of keeping this the beautiful city that it is?—Omaha Bee.

Properly Placed Monuments.

The submission of ready-made monuments causes embarrassment, not only to the art commission, but to the donors who have contributed the funds, usually a large number of interested persons who have been induced to give money with the expectation of seeing the monument erected. Presumably they have had nothing to do with business details of the matter, and they have but a faint conception of what a properly placed monument means in a city, and consequently, in case of rejection, are unable to understand why the city refuses to accept the monument. While the commission may be in entire sympathy with their desire to honor a distinguished person, or to commemorate an important event, nevertheless a city charter may impose on the commission the duty of accepting for the city only monuments of meritorious character, to be erected on suitable sites.

New York's Babies.

Over two-thirds of the babies born in New York city during 1910 had foreign-born mothers. Putting aside the questions of the physical and moral fitness of babies of foreign-born mothers at birth, we are justified in asking whether the majority of these children are born under conditions which are conducive to the rearing of healthy and efficient members of a democratic society. Is it any wonder that the leaders in the infant welfare campaign speak of ignorance as their greatest obstacle? A majority of the births to foreign mothers are taking place during a period when they are becoming adjusted to a new environment. The facts which have been presented are a warning to the community to take care that a favorable opportunity be afforded to the immigrant and his children. Otherwise, it were better to check immigration.—Independent.

ITALY'S CRACK MARKSMEN.

They Are All Athletes and Are the Pride of the Army.

The bersaglieri (sharpshooters) are the elite of the Italian army, and each bersagliera is a picked man, chosen for his hardihood and stamina, the average bersagliero being short and thickset, but with magnificent strength and exceptional powers of endurance.

There is no prouder soldier in the world than the full blown bersagliere as he swaggers along the street of an Italian town in his dark blue uniform, with its rich red facings, and on his head, set at a rakish angle, the famous wide brimmed black slouch hat adorned with large, heavy, drooping plumes of green cocks' feathers.

Bersaglieri, by the way, is pronounced ber-sarl-Iary.

When on the march the bersaglieri never walk as do other soldiers, but always go at a sort of quick trot.

These 25,000 or so men are among the most perfectly drilled troops in the world. Every single bersagliere, apart from being a man chosen for his endurance, is a fully trained athlete.—Westminster Gazette.

An Idol With Diamond Eyes.

The famous Orloff diamond was once the right eye of the great idol Serringham in the temple of Brahma. This precious gem was stolen at about the beginning of the eighteenth century by a French soldier who had made a pretense of being converted to the Hindu religion in order to gain the confidence of the priests and admission to the temple. The Frenchman first sold the diamond for £2,000. On the next turn it was bought by a banker of Constantinople for £12,000. The banker kept it until 1774 and then sold it to the Russian empress for £90,000 and a life pension. The gem has been in the Russian royal family ever since. As it is now set in the imperial scepter of Russia it presents a flattened, rose cut surface and weighs exactly 194½ carats.

Stinging Rebuke.

A society man said in Newport apropos of a current scandal:

"It reminds me of a very trenchant anecdote. A young married woman at a seashore hotel went up to a pretty girl in white who had been dancing like mad with the first-one's husband and said:

"'I've got a last year's coat suit that's quite good, really. To be sure, it's out of style. Still, would you like to have it?'

"The girl blushed red with mortification.

"'What!' she said. 'Do you think I'd wear your cast off clothes?'

"'I thought you might,' hissed the young married woman. 'You seem anxious enough to get my husband.'"—Exchange.

Grenadiers.

Evelyn writes in his diary under date 1678: "Now were brot into service a new sort of soldiers called Grenadiers, who were dexterous in flinging hand grenades; they had furred caps with coped crowns, which made them look very fierce; and some had long hoods hanging down behind as we picture fools." The original grenadiers hurled their grenades, and then charged the enemy with hatchets.—London Standard.

HIGH POWER GUNS

Long Range Weapons That Are Used in Land Warfare.

TYPES OF HEAVY ORDNANCE.

Field and Siege Guns, Howitzers and Mortars Are Very Much Akin, and It is Difficult to Say Just Where One Ends and the Other Begins.

There is no sharp and distinct understanding on the part of the average person as to the difference or distinction between the field gun, the siege gun, the howitzer and the mortar. The precise line of distinction or mark of distinction between these classes of weapons might be difficult even for an ordnance technician to define. It is certainly difficult for a layman to tell just where the gun ends and the howitzer begins, or where the howitzer ends and the mortar begins.

Considered in a broad and general way, the special purpose of the gun was and is to destroy other guns in march or in position, to destroy troops in the open and to batter down objects behind which troops find shelter. The projectile of the gun by high powder pressure was given a high velocity and a relatively flat trajectory, which means that the shot passing from the gun to the target did not rise high above the earth or above a line joining gun and target. To withstand the powder pressure required for this work the gun was heavy in relation to the weight of the projectile. From the fact that the shot traveled in a path relatively of slight curve, its slope of fall or its angle of fall was not steep. It would go through a stone wall, or perhaps smash it, or would go deep into a dirt embankment, but it was not easy to put a shot inside a narrow deep trench, or to plant a shot so close behind an embankment as to kill men sheltered there.

The shot from the gun was good at penetration, but ineffective in searching the rear of cover. To accomplish that purpose another style of gun was devised. The pressure per square inch of powder chamber was decreased, the angle of elevation of the gun was increased, the angle of departure of the shot was greatly increased and the shot after reaching the summit of its path fell so steeply that if the range were known and the practice good the shot would land in a trench or fall so close behind an embankment or parapet that men would find no shelter there.

This being possible by a reduction of powder pressure per square inch of chamber surface and consequent reduction in the speed of the projectile, it was found that the weight of the gun in relation to the weight of the projectile could be diminished, thus increasing its mobility or the facility with which it could be moved from place to place.

It was found that the barrel of this gun could be very much shortened, thus effecting a saving in weight. But in making the changes in this gun instead of absolutely decreasing its weight the gunmakers enlarged its bore and increased the size of its projectile, thus increasing its efficiency. This type of gun, though not in the narrow and technical sense a "gun," is ordnance and an element of artillery and was given the specific name "howitzer."

The mortar was a gun that could give a higher angle of fire and a more plunging fire than a howitzer. It was a very short piece of ordnance, fired from a platform and held down by ropes. Forts and mortar boats used it for getting a high angle of fire and a more plunging fire with larger shell than could be had using a howitzer. The range used to be obtained by varying the power charge. At this day mortars weighing at least four tons, fitted with an elevating device and range scale and with recoil and counter recoil or recuperator devices, are hauled around on wheels, set down on a platform also carried on wheels, and producing vertical fire with a high explosive shell weighing 250 pounds with or without a delay action fuse.

The field gun for the purpose of firing over ridges, getting at troops on the reverse slope of ridges or across hills, giving to shrapnel the proper slope of fall for effective distribution and keeping the load light on the horses has veered away from the gun as developed in ship and fortress artillery and in the direction of the howitzer-like properties. Field guns have had their trails split that the breech may be further depressed, thus giving them a higher angle of fire designed for use against air craft, and in effecting a useful compromise between power and mobility the trajectory of shots from this gun is high and the slope of fall quite steep.

Guns of high power—high powder pressure, high velocity and long range—have been built to give vertical fire or nearly vertical elevation against aeroplanes or dirigibles.

So, as announced, it is not an easy question to decide just where gun, howitzer and mortar divide.—Washington Star.

RESCUE PATIENT IN CHIMNEY

Sick Man Saved After Desperate Struggle by Hospital Attendants.

Philadelphia.—Wedged halfway down the chimney of the four story building used as a men's medical ward, Benedict Strun, a patient in the Philadelphia hospital, narrowly escaped suffocation while hospital attendants labored desperately to extricate him from the perilous position.

What prompted Strun to get in the chimney is a mystery to the hospital physicians unless his mind became temporarily unbalanced, and he attempted to escape. Strun went on the roof of the medical ward unobserved and climbed into the chimney. Soon afterward other patients in the ward reported to the attendants that they heard cries coming from the roof.

Armed with picks, some of the attendants began to open the chimney close to where the imprisoned man was suspended, while others hurried to the roof and attempted to reach him by stretching a rope down the mouth of the flue. Just at the time when the workers below had almost succeeded in making an opening into the chimney those on the roof managed to get a rope to Strun.

He succeeded in getting both arms free and after he had got a good grasp on the rope was hauled to the top.

AMERICANS IN CANADIAN ARMY

Two Thousand Serving, Says General Hughes—More Than 100 Slain.

London.—There are no fewer than 2,000 Americans in the ranks of the Canadian military contingent, said Major General Sam Hughes, Canadian minister of militia, at a meeting of Americans held here.

"I have already written letters of gratitude and sympathy," said General Hughes, "to mothers of more than 100 American boys who have fallen while fighting in Flanders alongside Canadian comrades. More than 2,000 enlisted, and we could have many more if we wished. Any number of West Pointers offered their services as officers, and some are now with us."

Meyerbeer and Thunder.

Meyerbeer, like Handel, composed best in a thunderstorm. He had a room made at the top of his house with glass roof and sides, so that he might enjoy these conditions to the full whenever they presented themselves. It is said that no beast of the field, no raven or nightjar, could scent the approach of a storm more unerringly than Meyerbeer, and nothing was allowed to interfere with his solitary enjoyment of it when it arrived. Wherever he was he would leave at the first premonitory rumble.

NOVA SCOTIA'S NEW LABOR LAW

Important Features of Workmen's Compensation Act.

After five years of agitation and education by the labor men of Nova Scotia, there has been placed upon the statute books of the province a workmen's compensation act which is regarded as the most advanced labor legislation ever enacted in Nova Scotia, and pronounced by some as superior to many compensation acts and excelled by none.

One of the most important features of the act is the principle of collective liability in substitution for the old principle of individual liability. This practically means a system of state insurance. The industries will be divided into groups, regulated as regards similarity in the nature of their work, or the hazards in connection therewith. Each class will contribute to the accident fund a sufficient sum each year to pay cost resulting from accidents occurring in the group to which they are attached. Assessments are made upon percentage of pay rolls. The fund is administered by the compensation board, which has large powers under the act. The province defrays the expenses of the board, which will consist of three members.

The new act differs from the old in every respect. The greatest amount payable under the old law was $1,500. The new act provides for the injured workman during his disability, even if it lasts his lifetime. Litigation is abolished, thus doing away with agents, adjusters, lawyers, stockholders or any third parties, who represent only a waste. Compensation will not be paid where disability lasts less than seven days, but if it lasts longer, compensation will date from time of injury.

The scale of compensation is regulated as follows: During the entire period of total disability resulting from an accident the workman is entitled to a weekly or monthly payment equal to 55 per cent of his average earnings before the accident. In case of partial disability he is entitled to 55 per cent of the difference between what he has earned before the accident and what he earns or can earn in suitable employment after the accident.

The maximum sum of yearly earnings upon which payments are computed is $1,200. Workmen earning more than this sum are within the act, but their compensation in case of accident is based on the established maximum of $100 per month.

Where death results and the workman leaves a widow, but no children, the widow is entitled to a monthly payment of $20 until her death or remarriage. In event of remarriage the sum of two years' payments is given her. If the dependents are a widow and children, in addition to payments to widow $5 per month shall be paid for each child under sixteen years, the maximum payment not exceeding $40 in all. If dependents are children only payments are $10 per month for each child under sixteen, but not more than $40 in all. Payments are provided for the dependents (father, mother, etc.) who are not included in foregoing. Payments are provided for loss of fingers, etc.

In return for advantages of the act the statutory rights of the workman are taken away. This will do away with court expenses and unnecessary delay in payment of compensation besides giving assurance to the employer that all he will be called upon to pay will be his proportionate cost of the accident happening in the group of industries to which he is attached.—Typographical Journal.

Chairman Walsh Praised.

The attempt to discredit Chairman Walsh of the industrial relations commission because of his vigorous cross examination of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., was answered by the Unitarian fellowship of social justice at Boston, which passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Unitarian fellowship of social justice sends its greeting to the Hon. Frank Walsh, chairman of the United States commission on industrial relations, and rejoices in his wisdom and courage in pursuing a relentless investigation of the Rockefeller interests and the Colorado strike."

OF INTEREST TO LABOR.

In the state of New York 2,000 department store girls receive less than $3 a week.

Colorado is the latest addition to the states having workingmen's compensation laws.

The street car strike in Chicago involved about 14,500 men, mostly motormen and conductors.

J. B. Butler, steel manufacturer and president of the Bessemer Pig Iron association, believes a vital problem confronting the iron and steel industries is a threatened shortage of labor.

Union plasterers of Boston have presented a schedule calling for 45 cents an hour, payment of car fare for out of town work and an allowance of $3 a week for board, time and a half for Saturday afternoon work and double time for night work.

With us it is a question what to do with our ex-presidents; for Mexico, what will the ex-presidents do with her.

FORESTS AND MOISTURE.

Trees Conserve Water, Aid Percolation and Retard Evaporation.

Trees drink in and transpire an enormous quantity of water. This giving off tempers the dryness of the nearby atmosphere. Moisture bearing currents of air are caught by forest areas as they are not by the heated plains. Local showers may thus become more frequent where trees abound, or at least the availability of whatever rain may fall is increased for the locality by forest growths.

Foliage, twigs and branches break the fall of the raindrops. So does the litter on the forest floor. Hence the soil under this cover is not compacted as in the open field, but is kept loose and granular, so water can readily penetrate and percolate. The water reaches the ground more slowly, dripping gradually from the leaves, branches and trunks, and thus more time is allowed for it to sink into the soil and appear again in springs or subsoil moisture lower down.

In forests there is much less evaporation of moisture than in the open country because sun and wind do not have such free play. It is estimated that forests have from 59 to 60 per cent of water supply more than the open fields because of increased percolation and decreased evaporation.—Country Gentleman.

PITH AND POINT.

European nations are finding war is easier to start than to stop.

The first thing a young man learns at college is how little his parents know.

Many a girl, when she marries, loses a good friend and gets a boarder—who grumbles.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and then it costs so much less.

Europe's great war in some of its aspects strangely resembles an American political deadlock.

By the time Europe gets through the manufacturers of antiques will find their occupation gone.

The trouble seems to be that lots of times when a man makes up his mind he doesn't use good material.

The dove of peace and the olive branch have been replaced by the airship and the long range gun.

The small boy who sits on the bank after his first summer swim learns too late the disadvantages of a place in the sun.

If San Marino and Monaco should ever lock horns a half dozen portholes would give them an ample supply of trenches.

The country has been warned of the approach of the seventeen year locusts. Fortunately it doesn't take them that long to transact business.

The American Bible society has issued 6,370,405 copies of the Bible during the last year, but then Europe's been too busy of late to read them.

NUT ENTHUSIASTS CONDEMN BAD WAYS

Rochester, Sept. 3.—The sale of seedling nut trees as grafted ones was condemned by Dr. J. Russell Smith, president of the Northern Nut Growers' Association, last evening at the close of the association's two-day convention. He said that the practice caused discouragement to many would be nut enthusiasts. Like the peach tree, a nut tree must be grafted to give sure resudlts, he explained. As a result of his address the asociation adopted a resolution condemning the sale of seedling nut trees, except when it is specifically understood by the buyer that his purchase is a seedling tree,

Another resolution that was adopted asks that all states which are now free from chestnut blight quarantine against it by requiring that all young trees sent from the outside be sterilized and tagged by the proper authorities. The growers fear that the blight eventually will destroy every chestnut tree in the country. Neither cure nor check for it has yet been found.

W. C. Reed, an expert from Vincennes, Ind., told of his work with pecans. He said there was a pecan tree in Kentucky that was three feet in diameter. had first limbs sixty-one feet above the ground, and bore a yearly crop of about 300 bushels.

The growers have high hopes of developing the black walnut to a better commercial stage.

"We know that black walnut, which have their meats come free in halves, are being sold," said Dr. Smith, "but we have been unable to trace them back to the trees, as they pass through so many hands before reaching the consumer. These seedling trees will be found and from them will be developed valuable black walnuts, one of the most nutritious of nuts."

Thomas P. Littlepage, of Washington, held his audience with a forceful plea for the cultivation of nut trees. He declared that there should be thousands of acres of English walnuts in the state. He urged farmers to cultivate and propagate the trees already upon their farms and make them more valuable by grafting if necessary. He held that the tree crops were the most valuable in the long run, besides adding to the attractiveness of the farm.

"Her Tailor Must Be a Genius"

That's often the comment that ripples in the wake of some woman who passes, dressed in suit or coat that fits as though woman and costume were made for each other. Yet, the garment is the work of no one tailor—it's the result of the combined suggestions and criticisms of a board of designers—each a recognized expert himself. Every Printzess model receives the benefit of their composite experience—that's why, when finished, it bears the stamp of genius. That is why Printzess suits fit without alteration.

AUBURN MARKET IS PERMANENT

That is Belief of Mayor Brister, Who Is Pleased With August Record of Sales.

The Auburn Citizen announces the apparent success of the Auburn public market and says an effort on the part of the Central Labor Union will be made to have the Common Council provide suitable shelter for the producers during the coming Fall and Winter.

"The market has been tried out," declared W. J. Nugent, business agent of the Central Labor Union, today, "and its initial success ought to insure proper facilities provided by the city for its continuance. The Central Labor Union has always stood for the market and in fact was largely instrumental in starting it. Two years ago the city voted to expend $30,000 for the establishment of a market and now is the time that action should be taken toward securing a suitable shelter for the one already instituted."

"I believe the public will make the market proposition an issue in the coming political campaign," added Mr. Nugent when questioned regarding the attitude of the union anent the political side of the enterprise

"I do not like to say that the union as a body will make the market an issue but it is certain that during the Fall and Winter such a produce exchange is as necessary as at any other time in the year and that the city should make such a market an assured thing."

Mayor Brister's Comment

Mayor Brister is commenting on the market declared: "I don't believe the people of Auburnw ould consent to its removal. The relations between producer and purchaser have always been of the best and each day the market is open, it is the usual thing to see the same people on hand to buy and sell with a goodly sprinkling of additional faces. Personally, I think the thing has come to stay."

Sales in Number 32,920

According to figures of Market Master Miskell made out, the stupendous number of 32,920 sales have been made during the month of August, the first entire month that the market has been operated. Although the market has been open only 14 days during that time, a total of 514 producers have been placed and the average daily sales have amounted to 2,351. Many more not recorded in all probability have been made. More than a carload of potatoes has been disposed of in the 14 days.

The report indicates that the average daily number of producers has been 37 3-4. The biggest day was on August 28 when 3,495 sales were recorded and the smallest day on August 4 when only 480 were made. However, on this particular date, the opening of the market was made on Wednesday, immediately following the regular opening day when it rained so hard that the producers had to seek shelter in neighboring barns.

ROCHESTER HAS BIG DAY AT PUBLIC MARKETS

Rochester, Sept. 3.—Trade in country produce at the Public Market today, while not a record breaker, was fully up to the average for the time of year between 800 and 900 loads of seasonable fruits and vegetables finding new owners. There was a large attendance of buyers within the inclosure, and under a rather urgent demand, both on home and shipping account, the bulk of receipts passed from first to second hands at prices showing but few slight changes from the ruling earlier in the week.

Supplies of peaches were again very heavy and prices ruled low, white stock selling at 20@30c and the best yellow at 35@40c a basket. Apples, pears and plums held their own, selling at full former prices. The bulk of new potatoes on market sold at 50c a bushel. Tomatoes ruled firm but not quotably higher, selling at 22½@25c a basket.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

IN THE WORLD OF SPORT.

Johnny Evers, Captain of the Boston Braves.

John J. Evers, captain of the Boston Braves and rated as one of the brainiest players in baseball, has reconsidered his determination to quit the game and will stick the season out. Evers attributes his recent breakdown to the attack of pneumonia he suffered last winter and the subsequent fracture of his leg this season. Evers began his baseball career with Troy in 1902 and joined the Cubs in 1903. He was Frank Chance's lieutenant during the days of the Cub successes, and his quick thinking gained a pennant for the team in 1908. In 1913 he managed the Cubs, but a break with Charley Murphy resulted in his going to Boston. That his acquisition made the Braves a pennant winner in 1914 is generally admitted.

Hoppe to Be Handicapped.

Willie Hoppe must now pay the penalty of success. The wonderful little player who has proved himself so far superior to all other professionals in the world at every kind of balk line billiards that he has a strong grip on three titles is now to be handicapped to make the play interesting. The authorities in charge of this sport are making a study of the field in order to arrange a series of handicaps that will virtually put all of the billiard players on the same plane. The idea is to make conditions so nearly equal that any of the players can give Hoppe a sound battle and actually attract spectators, while the runaway matches of the present do not interest billiard fans.

When Walter Weakens.

There never has been a time since Walter Johnson joined the Washington team that he has not been pounded hard if he happened to hit some player with a pitched ball and the latter was injured. Some years ago Walter "beaned" a player named Martin, who was with the Yanks, and became so wild after the accident that he could not finish the game. It was the same recently when he laid Vitt low. Vitt and Johnson were warm friends, and the latter could not get the ball over the plate after he had hit the batsman.

Astor Offers Auto Cup.

Vincent Astor has announced that he will offer a cup for the inaugural race meeting of the new Sheepshead Bay (N. Y.) speedway and sports arena on Oct. 2. The trophy is to be known as the Vincent Astor cup and will be awarded in addition to $50,000 in cash prizes already offered by the speedway promoters. In order to qualify for this cup drivers will have to show that their cars are capable of a speed of at least eighty-five miles an hour, which will insure probably the fastest motor race ever staged.

Cutshaw of Brooklyn.

George Cutshaw can thank Bill Dahlen for his success. When George joined the Brooklyn team the managers of the coast clubs, where he had been playing, including Harry Wolverton, predicted that Cutshaw would fail. Bill admitted that the lad might not set the world on fire as a sticker, but decided he would make good generally and hung on to him. Cutshaw is hitting around the 270 mark.

Detroit Buys Outfielder.

Manager Bill Coughlin of the Scranton club in the New York State league has sold Outfielder George Maisel to the Detroit Americans. It is understood the price is $3,500. The outfielder is a brother of Fred Maisel, third baseman for the New York Americans.

Old Associates.

Jack Barry and Manager Bill Carrigan of the Boston Red Sox ought to be able to get along together in fine style. They both played together at Holy Cross during their college days.

Pipp Considered Big "Find."

The impression is growing rapidly that the most promising youngster uncovered by either major leagues this season is playing with the Yankees. His name is Walter Pipp.

POPULAR MECHANICS

Substitute For Horn.

A cheap and easily made substitute for horn can be made of wheat flour and sodium silicate. This substitute is very hard and strong and, by inserting organic dye into the composition while mixing, it can be colored to imitate almost any kind of horn substance. The compound is made by mixing ten parts (by volume) of sodium silicate (40 degrees Baume) with distilled water, and then stirring the resultant liquid into a thick paste with fine white wheat flour. The mass is then allowed to stand for three weeks, during which time it undergoes a chemical reaction that produces a hard, hornlike substance. This composition can be molded without pressure when first made and turned and machined like brass after it has set.

Future Development of Flying.

If this war, as it bids fair now to do, perfects the machine and so standardizes its manufacture that one may order his aeroplane or hydroaeroplane as one does his automobile, the field for its use is already waiting and established. We may then confidently look for as great a boom in aeroplane manufacturing soon after the war as we saw in the sudden development of the automobile business once the machine's reliability was an assured fact. Indeed, a more rapid growth, due to the forcing process in development arising from war's necessities, is impossible than obtained in the case of the automobile.—Engineering Magazine.

When the Engine Backfires.

A gas engine will backfire because some of the charge is still burning in the combustion space when the intake valve opens. It will be seen from this that to produce backfiring a slow burning mixture is required. Generally backfiring is due to too weak a mixture. The weaker a mixture is the slower it burns. The amount of backfiring naturally depends to some extent upon the speed of the motor. It follows that in an engine running at 1,000 revolutions per minute the period between each spark is much shorter than in an engine running at 500 revolutions per minute.

Support For Radiator Hose.

In certain types of automobiles the radiator is supported at the top by the rubber hose which connects the manifold to the radiator, says Popular Mechanics. The constant vibration of the radiator and its forward and backward movements are all imparted to the rubber hose, with the result that it becomes badly warped and twisted, and it does not take long before the hose is useless.

Trouble of this nature can be eliminated to a great extent by introducing a connection between the radiator and manifold so that the latter, being made of cast iron, will more readily stand the strains than the rubber hose. A piece of steel is firmly clamped to the manifold and is in turn connected to the radiator by another piece of steel. Such a connection is very flexible and therefore is capable of withstanding high strains and vibrations.

Driving on Slippery Roads.

If you are caught out in a rain and have to drive on slippery roads do not go at a speed which will necessitate the use of brakes. Try to avoid applying the brakes, for there is no surer way of skidding than suddenly to apply brakes while moving rapidly. And even in coasting down a wet hillside it is best to put the gears into low or intermediate and shut off the spark. In this way your car is held back by the compression of the engine without the use of brakes to any great extent.

Red Paint Tested.

All sorts of weather conditions failed to cause any perceptible fading of a new brand of red paint which was applied to Fire Island light vessel, New York, in June, 1914, and was exposed to the elements for ten months, during which the craft was continuously on station. The bureau of lighthouses reports that the paint showed up a bright red at the end of that period and gave the vessel a very conspicuous and neat appearance.—Consular Report.

Uses of Molybdenite.

The mining of molybdenite is becoming an important industry in Tasmania, where extensive deposits of this rare mineral have recently been found. Molybdenite is used for a variety of purposes, but its principal value is in the manufacture of steel, to which it gives a hardness and toughness that make the steel suitable for use in propeller shafts, guns and boilers.

The Farm Engine.

In selecting an engine for farm work the prospective purchaser will find it economical to get an engine that will develop a little surplus power. It costs a trifle more and is a little more expensive to operate, but it carries the load without the wear and tear that an engine undergoes when overloaded.

A Story of The Balkans

By DONALD CHAMBERLIN

Shortly after the assassination of the Austrian royalties in Servia that brought on the big European war I was talking with my friend Hardegan about it and noticed that he was under considerable emotion.

"If the subject is disagreeable to you, Ned," I said, "let us change it."

He made no reply for a few moments, then lowering his voice said:

"You know that my wife was born and brought up in one of the Balkan states."

"I know that you have been very secretive about your wife's past," I replied.

"There is a reason for my secretiveness. The people of the Balkan states have lived in a constant state of oppression by the Turks and of late years in dread of being absorbed by one or another of European sovereigns. My wife had spent her childhood in familiarity with the barbarous acts of the Turks and when she became a woman saw her country in process of passing into an empire lying to the west."

He then told me the following story:

"My wife, as you know, is called Anna. That is not her name, but I shall not give you her real name or tell you where is her birthplace. When I went abroad before settling down to my profession I put aside a year for travel. In Vienna I made the acquaintance of an Austrian of prominence who let me into the secret of Austrian intentions respecting the provinces lying to the eastward of the empire. That summer Bosnia and Herzegovina were annexed.

"From Vienna I went to Servia and thence through all the Balkan states. In one of them—I shall not say which—I met my wife. We took a desperate fancy to each other at once. Her family was noble, and, she being both refined and intelligent, there seemed no reason why we should not be married except that we were of a different race.

"After our engagement I told my wife what I had learned about Austrian intentions concerning certain Balkan states. I noticed that she listened with deep emotion. She hated the Austrians and seemed to dread their encroachment. My information confirmed certain hints she had received that the emperor of Austria was about to appropriate her native state and that a certain Austrian diplomat was then in the capital—in which she lived—who was taking certain preparatory steps for the occupation. This seemed to work upon her mind, distressing her very much.

"I was glad when our wedding day arrived, for she was to leave her home with me for America. The bridal was solemnized with a certain barbaric splendor which was enhanced by the picturesque costumes of all but myself, I wearing the usual American clothes and looking for all the world like a weed in a flower garden.

"In the evening after the ceremony my wife bade goodby to her family and friends with so much emotion that I wondered if she would be content in our far distant home. Then we entered the carriage that was to take us to the station. Before starting my wife told me to ask the coachman to stop at the house of a friend of hers to whom she wished to say goodby. I noticed that Anna carried in her hand a small package, and I asked her why she had not put it in a trunk or a satchel. She replied that it was glass and perishable.

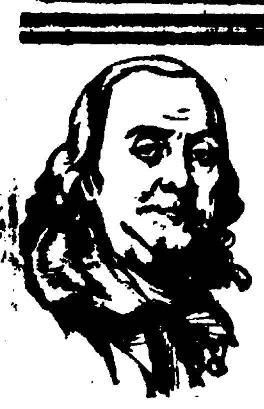
"When we reached her friend's house she asked me to remain in the carriage while she went in and bade her friend goodby. She would not be gone more than two or three minutes. I assented. She went to the door, still carrying the package. A young woman admitted her; the two disappeared inside for about a minute; then Anna reappeared and returned to me—without the package. I saw no evidence of an emotional parting between the two girl friends. Indeed, both seemed absorbed in something else.

"From Anna's home we passed into Hungary. In the morning we were at Budapest, and at the hotel I noticed knots of persons talking excitedly on some subject and on inquiry learned that an attempt had been made during the night in the city we had left to assassinate the Austrian diplomat, who was preparing the way for the state's annexation. A woman had thrown a bomb through an open window into a room where her intended victim was sitting. He was badly injured, but not killed. The news did not appear in the newspapers. It was simply whispered from one person to another. Indeed, it was never published to the world.

"When I rejoined my wife I told her what I had heard. She turned pale and in two quick questions asked if the girl who had thrown the bomb had been captured and if the attempt had been successful. The answer to the first question I did not know. The second I answered mechanically, for my wife's emotion, taken with other events, led me to suspect that she had delivered to the assassin the bomb that had been used.

"The look of horror on my face revealed to Anna what was on my mind. Clasping her arms about me, she confessed that she had been a party to the attempted assassination and begged me not to turn against her. Despite my repugnance to her participation in what the world considered a crime, I could not turn away from a bride of less than a day.

"'We must get out of Austria at once,' I said, and within half an hour we were on our way to the train."



Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

CARE and practice are the chief requisites for success in the home roasting of coffee. The roasting may be done in the oven, but probably the beginner may find it easier to watch the process and prevent burning if the top of the stove or gas burner is used.

A heavy frying pan with a lid will probably be the most easily available utensil, although many coffee connoisseurs declare that contact with metal of any kind in roasting, grinding or infusing causes deterioration of flavor.

Such enthusiasts insist on having their coffee roasted in heavy earthen pans, pounded in a marble or earthen mortar and infused in an earthen coffee pot. Certainly such coffee is delicious, but is out of question for most of us. In any case avoid tin in dealing with coffee. An aluminium frying pan would be best.

Wash one pound of raw coffee berries in cold water, let dry on a sieve, spread thinly in a heavy pan, then set over the gas, turned quite low, and heat gradually, stirring and shaking occasionally for about fifteen minutes or until yellow; then cover and increase the heat, shaking thoroughly until all the berries are a deep, even cinnamon or chestnut color and have a sort of oily appearance. One burned berry will spoil your coffee, for particular drinkers.

If you like egg in your coffee you may beat one up and add it when the coffee has cooled somewhat, but is still warm, though not hot. Beat with the coffee until every bean is glossy and coated with egg. The egg dries and helps to preserve the flavor, as well as to clear the coffee if made by the boiled method.

If drip coffee—which, of course, is far more wholesome—is preferred the egg should not be used. French coffee roasters sometimes add about two level teaspoonfuls of clarified butter to every pound of roasting coffee and about one level teaspoonful of sugar. These are added while the final browning is being given. Tastes differ as to whether the addition of either, both or neither is best.

Keep the coffee in air tight tins and grind only as required. A little warming in the oven or over the fire immediately before grinding tends to freshen the flavor. Be sure to measure the coffee carefully, so as to secure a uniform brew.

ENTERTAINMENT KINK.

How to Give a Cafeteria Party, Making the Guests Do the Waiting.

After all the guests had assembled in the library they were invited to come into the dining room through a small door, which obliged them to enter one by one. At their right they passed a table heaped high with black enameled waiters, to which each helped himself or herself in passing.

Still standing in line, they conned the burlesque bills of fare posted around the room and, having made up their minds to a choice of the various goodies, helped themselves from the array of dishes spread on a narrow table extending the length of the room and presided over by a trio of young people attired in the extreme of waiters' uniforms. Having filled their trays to their satisfaction, they gathered the necessary table silver, and as they passed slowly from the low French windows out on to the glass inclosed, heated and lighted veranda each was handed his gay paper napkin, one to go under the tray and an individual one numbered to indicate table. These napkins had, of course, been numbered in duplicate, and one did not know until he had found his table who his partner was going to be. Each little table was decorated with a gay posey and flanked with a pitcher of ice water and two tumblers. The veranda was decorated with garlands of electric bulbs dropped into Japanese lanterns.

After much merrymaking all the lively crowd was seated, only leaving their tables to return to the table for second helps for themselves or partners of the delicious chicken salad, shrimp pates or rasp rolls.

When the first course was entirely finished the proprietor (hostess) asked each youth to return napkins and trays of used dishes to the dumb waiter, while she again distributed the napkins in twos. When the youths returned the numbers on their fresh napkins told them that they must seek partners with numbers corresponding and get for them the cream and cake which by this time was dished and waiting on the long table.

Still another change of partners was effected when the coffee and mints were distributed, and the affair passed off pleasantly, terminating in a jolly veranda dance.

How to Make Flaxseed Lemonade.

Wash one ounce of flaxseed and place in a saucepan with one quart of water and the peel from three lemons. Boil slowly for one hour. Strain and add two cupfuls of boiling water and sugar to taste and the lemon juice. This is fine for a cold if taken hot.

HOW TO PROVIDE THE HOME WITH SEVERAL USEFUL ARTICLES.

A simple and ingenious device has been created to take care of the dolly. Without requiring much space and insuring freedom from creases and dust, the new cretonne dolly rolls will be found delightfully serviceable. To a cretonne covered pole about three inches in diameter and a foot or two in length is attached a piece of the material, which winds about the dolly and the pole and ties in a small bow.

Particularly serviceable for tea under the trees is the lace cake cover. This, square or elliptical in shape and in various sizes, will keep insects and falling leaves from the dish. It is made on a wire frame, simply covered with lace in a fillet pattern.

Less expensive than the telephone dolls and less suggestive of Victorianism are the telephone screens, which are very attractive and easily made. A small screen frame of wire or wood is covered with silk. Gold lace and tiny rosebuds may be used for trimming, with a braiding or cord about the edges.

The lamp and lamp shade are undergoing more metamorphoses than any other single article of furnishing. The newest form is that of the shade charmingly stenciled in silhouettes. A wooden stand for desk or table or even tall enough for the floor, painted in canary yellow and black or ivory and black, is surmounted by a canary or ivory shade. On the yellow or ivory ground are stenciled the most delicate of silhouettes and copies of old and modern masterpieces. Exquisite bits of sprite life disport themselves with all the dainty vigor of which they are capable. While the best effect is obtained when the lamp is illuminated the black figures hold their own excellently in an outside light.

THE USEFUL PAINT BRUSH.

How Springtime Inspires Toward a General Freshening Up of the Home.

Paint and paint brush should be as close friends of the housewife as are needle and thread. There is the baby buggy of wicker, stained and dirty from long use. A small can of stain and a couple of coats of black on the springs and wheels will make it withstand the still harder test of spring showers. The baby's iron crib looks as though it has a case of incipient measles where baby has dented off the enamel with the stock of its toy gun. Two coats, or, better, three, of white paint and enamel will cover the blisters and make the crib as sanitary and pleasing as when new.

On close inspection the gas stove and its pipes appear rustily dingy and down in the mouth, as it were. Ah, just the thing! A small can of special stove paint in black will make the stove gleam happily again and remove its unkempt air. Perhaps, too, the radiators are spotted and shineless. It is only the work of a half hour to paint them with special silver or gold radiator paint, so that they will look well even though out of commission so soon.

The kitchen is an important field for the use of paint brush and paint. Frequently unsightly plumbing can, as suggested, be made attractive by the various lacquer paints. The pantry shelves need never be hard to clean if they are treated to one or two coats of white enamel. Table drawers also can be painted, which will prevent them from absorbing grease and getting so dirty. The legs and front of the ordinary kitchen table will look better and stay cleaner if given a coat of paint harmonizing with the other colors in the room. Wooden salt boxes, strips on which to hang utensils, the space between shelves in many closets, can all be made brighter and more sanitary by a liberal use of paint.

All woods with exposed pores absorb moisture and grease. Water enters the pores, causes them to swell and thus become disfigured. The more impervious the wood surface can be made the easier it is to keep it clean and the longer the wood will last. Paint, varnish and stain, whose base should always be the best linseed oil, fill the pores of the wood, coating and rendering it impervious. And paint is not hard to clean. It is the open, untreated woodwork which looks dingy, absorbs grease and is hard to care for.

How to Bake a Fish So It Will Be Delicious.

Do not put water in the pan unless you wish to steam the fish instead of baking it. After the fish has been well cleaned stuff with the following dressing, which is sufficient for a fish weighing from four to six pounds: Take one cupful of crackers, one saltspoonful of salt, same amount of pepper, two tablespoonfuls of chopped onion, tablespoonful of chopped celery, teaspoonful of capers and one teaspoonful of chopped pickles; also add one-quarter cupful of melted butter. Mix well and stuff into fish. This will make a dry dressing. If you prefer a wet dressing, which many people do, use stale bread crumbs and moisten with one beaten egg and the butter or moisten the cracker crumbs with warm water. Place in pan, put two or three tablespoonfuls of butter over and flour fish and when the flour has browned baste often with the melted butter. Bake until brown and be sure to baste often.

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review

ADAPTATION OF A PARIS COSTUME.

A charming frock of tan faille trimmed effectively with bands of beaver fur and a vest of novelty silk.

Soft pale tan shades and a new tan which has a hint of apricot in it to make it warmer are among the new colors shown in the frocks which Paris has sent over for Autumn, despite the troubled conditions there. The accompanying model is in tan faille trimmed with beaver and a vest of novelty silk. The skirt is a three-piece model gathered at the top, falling in full folds at the bottom.

If the faille is 44 inches wide, 5¼ yards will be sufficient for the costume in medium size, with 4½ yards for banding and ¾ yard 36-inch silk for the trimming.

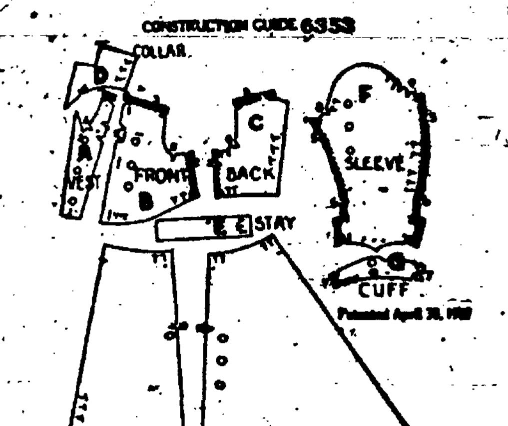
Being a three-piece model, the skirt is not difficult to make, and many home dressmakers prefer to finish this first so that it will be ready to be attached to the waist when the latter is ready. The gores are joined as notched, leaving left side seam free above large "O" perforation in front gore for placket. Gather upper edge between double "TT" perforations. Adjust a straight or a bias band of material (about 4 inches wide when finished) to position on skirt as illustrated on reverse side of envelope, stitching upper edge of band about 8 inches above lower edge of skirt. Sew skirt to lower edge of waist over stay, center-fronts and backs even, side seam at under-arm seam. Stitch tape under gathers in skirt from center-front to the left side seam and finish for closing.

At this point the skirt will have to be put aside until the waist is ready. First, turn under the front edge of the front of the waist on slot perforation and lap on vest to small "o" perforations, notches even; stitch ⅛ inch from folded edge.

Turn hem in vest on double "oo" perforations. Center-front indicated by large "O" perforations in vest. Close under-arm and shoulder seams as notched. Gather lower edge of waist between double "TT" perforations. Sew stay to lower edge of waist, centers backs even, small "o" perforation at under-arm seam and bring front edge to center-front. Face collar and sew to neck edge as notched.

Now, sew skirt to lower edge of waist over stay, center-front and backs even, side seam at under-arm seam. Stitch tape under gathers in skirt from center-front to the left side seam and finish for closing.

Returning to the waist, gather the sleeves between double "TT" perforations and close seam as notched, leaving extensions in long sleeve free. Turn under extension on slot perforation, lap to small "o" perforations. Hem or face about the wrists and finish with a band of fur or other desired trimming, then sew sleeve into armhole as notched.

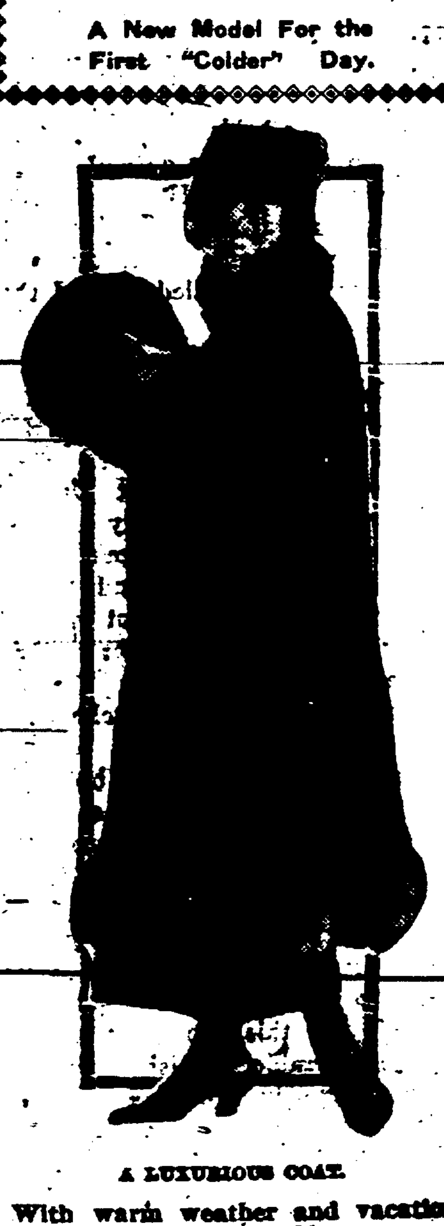


Beaver is one of the most fashionable furs because brown felts are to lead the fashion.

Pictorial Review Costume No. 6353. Sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust. Price, 15 cents.

A COOL HERALD.

A New Model For the First "Colder" Day.



A LUXURIOUS COAT.

With warm weather and vacations still with us it seems farfetched to bring in our furs. But furs and more of them are the coming note, and this handsome design of black seal, in rippling fullness and edged with skunk, suggests one new design. Please observe the smallish size of the muff.

New Towel Ends.

The ends of the newest embroidered towels are surely trying to emulate the latest of dress fashions, for they are showing every variety of scallops. Where one was once content to hemstitch the ends of a huck towel and place a simple embroidered letter in the middle of one end, to be strictly up to date one must now slash the toweling into some new cut of scalloping. There are square scallops, pointed ones, wide and shallow and deep rounded scallops and scallops within scallops. And they are embroidered in colors, often with a finish of a second buttonholing of another color or a crocheted picot edge. Fillet crochet inserts are quite the thing now for towel ends; sometimes one sees a piece of filet insertion with three initials of the intended owner crocheted in the mesh. Cutwork initials or solid initials with an oval background of cutwork are very effective and are not difficult when one considers the results obtained. The plain woven ends of Turkish towels are now being embroidered, most often with a flowered border of darned work or French knots.

Color Legibility.

In London recently more than a thousand persons participated in tests that gave these average comparative distances at which signs of same size and lettering, but of different color combinations, were readable:

	Feet.		Feet.
Black on yellow	376	Yellow on black	358
Green on white	367	Black on white	351
Red on white	364	White on red	350
Blue on white	364	White on green	341

A Matter of Doubt.

"So Dolblay has decided to get married?"

"I merely said that he was going to get married. Whether the decision was made by Dolblay or his fiancee or some member of his or her family, I am in no position to state."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

LONDON MEAT PRICES SOAR.

Frozen Beef Up 74 Per Cent Since Last Year—Frozen Mutton Fifty.

Great increases in the prices of meat are disclosed in the report of the superintendent of the London central market. He says the supply of meats of all kinds for July, 1915, at the market totaled 29,702 tons as compared with 36,983 tons in July, 1914.

The price of fresh beef increased 43 per cent, while that of frozen beef increased 74 per cent. Fresh mutton increased 13 per cent and frozen mutton 50 per cent.

Woman's Enlarging Sphere.

At twenty-five a man used to begin to live, but a woman was on the shelf. Up to a few decades ago the woman of twenty-five, married or single, was usually passee. If married she forswore romance and spent her days in dull and commendable faithfulness to "kinder, kirche, kueche;" if unmarried and minus an independent income, heaven help her! She passed gently into the maiden aunt stage—household helper in general to any married sister, brother, cousin that ever wanted her; subject to call when there was illness, dire need, a new baby or bustling preparations for some important event; to take errors and omissions meekly and without complaint. Sometimes she persisted in being young even at twenty-seven and curled her hair and squeaked her voice to a childish treble and trained in a set of kittenish manners for social purposes. She hated to give up the thought of ever being married.

And here's her twentieth century substitute who is an undeveloped child under twenty-five. She is perfectly willing to marry, but she has plenty of interests to occupy her if she doesn't. Moreover, she has plenty of interests in addition to home and family when she does marry.

For there is one thing that business and professional interests have done for the modern woman which makes them beyond price—that have protracted youth and deferred recognition of old age indefinitely. Business and professional life do for women what they have done for men. It takes a man about ten years to put a business on the level of substantial success. Sometimes it takes more, occasionally less. The well planned business life of the average man makes the years between twenty and thirty hard plugging. At thirty he begins to have a secure footing, and if he has really lived, if he has the rich human experience that falls to the average normal individual, he is a well rounded personality and in the prime of life at forty.

Interesting occupation has shoved ahead woman's prime of life similarly. The young bud of nineteen or twenty is only pleasant to look at or to play with for a little while. From twenty to thirty, if she is actively engaged in doing something worth while, she is developing continually. She is enriching her mind and personality by actual contact with life, more real than that viewed from the safe walls of a comfortable home. She is building her business life, facing conflict daily, learning self reliance. Her soul goes unshielded through the fires of experience. At thirty she is in the prime of life, rich in interest and human sympathy and understanding. For it is not alone the patting of baby curls that develops womanly sympathy, but working in the world and seeing and experiencing what other men and women endure.

Woman's life used to be mainly retrospective. Before thirty she was already engaged in the gentle occupation of reiterating again and again her youthful experiences and conquests. The modern woman with an occupation looks ahead. The past is to her only a foundation, and her days are filled with planning for next month, next year and ten years ahead.

Sandwiches and Sandwich Fillings.

Honey Sandwich.—Spread thin slices of bread with very thick honey that will not run readily; spread other side with butter stirred with cream. Press one slice of each together and cut into fancy shapes if something tasty is desired for an afternoon tea.

Baked Bean Sandwich.—Reduce the beans to a pulp (red kidney beans preferred). Mix pulp with melted butter, onion juice, a pinch of dry mustard, a few olives or pimentos chopped and a dash of tomato ketchup or chili sauce. Spread the mixture between slices of brown bread. Chili sauce is generally used.

Deviled Ham Sandwiches.—To make deviled ham chop very fine one pint of boiled ham (more fat than lean), six hard boiled eggs, one teaspoonful of mustard (the made kind), season and press in a mold. This will keep for weeks and is a good filling for sandwiches.

Fillings for sandwiches are numerous and nearly always on hand. First there come the sweet fillings, such as creamy fudges of all kinds, mashed chocolate creams, maple fillings, creamy maple fudge, caramel fudge, candied ginger as a garnish for outside of sandwiches, also as a filling; raisins chopped and mixed with fudge or chopped and mixed with butter, etc. They make a good filling. They do not attack digestion quite so harshly when used in this manner and may be used between crackers, cookies or bread with good results and are always liked by those who use them. Second come the cheese fillings, American cheese and Swiss cheese, and they may be cut wafer thin and served in many ways with pimentos on buttered bread. Nuts and raisins are popular now as sandwich fillings, as are also the meat, chicken and vegetable fillings.

Darning Hint.

When darning run the thread around the hole first, drawing the hole up until the edges lie flat on the darner. The hole will seem much smaller, and the darn can be made more satisfactorily.

TODAY'S FASHION NOTE

MORE SUMMER DESSERTS.

FRUIT WHIP.—One cupful of sugar, one cupful of soft fruit, white of one egg, all put into a good sized mixing bowl and beaten with an egg whip for thirty minutes. Drain the fruit if canned. Peaches, apricots and berries of all kinds are excellent. You will be surprised at the creamy taste and nice appearance of this whip when served on cake or pumpkin pie. This amount will serve six.

Nut Cream.—Cover two full tablespoonfuls of gelatin with half a cupful of milk. Whip up half a pint of cream and add the dissolved gelatin to it. Beat in half a cupful of sugar, the beaten white of an egg and a cupful of chopped walnut meats. Flavor with vanilla. Whip until stiff. Mold in small cups or in a large mold. Turn out when very cold and serve with whipped cream.

Apple Slump.—One quart of apples, one cupful of flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of milk and one-half cupful of sugar.

Wash, pare and core the apples, put into saucepan, which has a close fitting lid, with one cupful of boiling water and boil ten minutes. Sprinkle with sugar and cover with the dough. Put on the lid and boil twenty minutes without lifting the lid. Serve with sugar and milk. Dust with cinnamon if you like.

Dough.—Sift the flour, salt and baking powder into a bowl, add the milk and mix well. Take a teaspoonful of dough into floured hands, roll into balls, put over the apples and boil.

Fruit Punch.—Serve from a bowl hollowed from a cake of ice. A good recipe is: One quart of pineapple, cut in small pieces; one dozen lemons, sugar to taste, one pint of grape juice, one quart of cherries and four pints of mineral water. Lemonade served from a bowl hollowed from a cake of ice is as good to the eye as the beverage is to the palate.

Fruit in its season is not only food, but medicine, and it is mistaken economy to do without it. The acids of the fruits are used to clean the mouth, stomach and intestines. They kill the germs that have found their way to the living canal; they cool the blood; they aid the liver cells to do their work. For this reason they should be used freely in some form or other during their season.

Good Intentions Alone Can't Make Good Government

The Machinery Has a Lot to Do With It

Our Machinery is worn out and antiquated. Good men have tried to make it work and have failed because it is a relic based on discarded theories.

Fortunately there is a Remedy. A State Law passed in 1914 gives us the right to secure the Commission Manager Plan which is the most efficient type of city government yet devised.

Uuder an antiquated charter an able man may make a fair record. Under a modern charter even a mediocre man may succeed to some extent.

To get the best results we need a modern charter and an able man.

Help us to get both for Fulton.

FRANK LYNCHERS UNSCATHED

Grand Jury Reports: "We Have Been Unable to Connect Anybody With Perpetration of This Crime."

Marietta, Ga., Sept. 2.—"Finis" was written in the investigation of the lynching of Leo M. Frank. The Cobb County Grand Jury, after a two days' session, reported to Judge Patterson that whiles everal clues had been found the evidence was insufficient to bring indictments against any one.

Of course, the matter can be taken up by a succeeding Grand Jury, but this, it can be taken for granted never will be done.

During Wednesday and Thursday more than thirty-five witnesses were examined, but the majority of them were questioned for only a few minutes. All refused to discuss what they told the jurymen, but it is understood that very little of importance was brought out.

In part the Grand jury presentments say:

"We have diligently inquire without envy, hatred or malice, and without fear, fafvor, affection, reward or hope thereof, into all the circumstances connected with the killing of Leo M. Frank. We have worked faithfully and hard to discover who were the perpetrators of this crime.

Have Full Cooperation

"We have had the active co-operation of the Governor of the State he giving us all information that he has; all the Atorney General of the State, and especially have we had the active co-operation of the Colicitor General of this circuit and of the Sheriff and his deputy in Cobb County, and have examined before our body every witness we could find who might know anything pertaining to this matter.

"We have found several clues, but have been unable to find anyone who could identify any participant. We have done our best, under our oath, and we regret to state that we have been unable to find enough evidence to indict any one for this crime.

"We have been unable to connect any body with the perpetration of this offense, or to identify any one who was connected with it although we have investigated the information furnished us by officers and other parties and have followed up letters, signed and unsigned, and to this end we have subpoenaed and examined many witnesses in an effort to disclose the perpetrators of this crime, but none of these witnesses could identify any of the parties.

"From careful investigation we find that the reports which have gone all over the country of lawlessness in Cobb County and the city of Marietta, before and after this crime, are untrue. The people of Cobb County knew nothing of this crime until they heard of the body being found near Frey's gin, in this county. The city of Marietta and the county of Cobb were quiet before this trouble and are quiet now."

Anonymous letters, referred to in the report, still are being received by officials of Cobb county and others, but the tendency now is to ignore them.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze

Albany, Sept. 3.—The proposed amendment to the State Constitution which permits the legislature to convene of its own accord for impeachment purposes, if adopted by the people, will forever set at rest any doubt as to the legality of the court of impeachment. Theh plan asa dopted already by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention, was found necessary in the opinion of the delegates as the result of the legal battle which resulted after the legislature had decided to put William Sulzer on trial.

Under the provisions of the new impeachment proceedings as outlined by the Constitutional Convention, Article Three reads as follows:

"The legislature may of its own motion, in the manner to be provided by joint rule which shall continue in force until abrogated or amended by both the senate and assembly, convent to take action in the matter of removel of a judge of the court of appeals or justice of the supreme court. The assembly may of its own motion, in the manner to be provided by rule which shall continue in force until abrogated or amended by the assembly, convene for the purpose of impeachment. At a meeting under this section no subject shall be acted upon except that for which the meeting is herein authorized to be held."

It will be remembered that there was a great division of opinion as to whether the impeachment proceedings attending the administration of William Sulzer were Constitutional. The matter was taken to the attorney general for an opinion and he held that the assembly, which was the house in which the motion to impeach was born, had acted within its jurisdiction.

The attorneys for Sulzer contended that since the legislature had been called back by Governor Sulzer to reconsider the question of direct nominations, it was bound by law to consider nothing other than the matters specified by the executive in his proclamation calling them back and in his special message to it. In that the articles of impeachment were framed while the legislature were in extraordinary session, there appeared doubt as to whether it had acted wholly with i nits prerogatives in voting to impeach.

A counter argument was raised to the effeet that no governor would call a legislature together for the purpose of having himself impeached and that providing an executive had performed some gross act of treason during the recess of a legislature, which might be immediately after final adjournment, there would be no way to punish for such treason until the legislature met during the following year. It was also pointed out that by that time an executive might have served out his term.

The above amended section to Article Three aims to settle for ever any such division of opinion as sprang to life during the Sulzer administration by specifically providing that a legislature may convene by joint resolution whenever it sees fit for impeachment purposes.

Because of the contention raised by the Sulzer attorneys, it is believed by many today that the legislature ousted him contrary to law.

WILD GEESE RAISE FEAR OF AN EARLY FALL

STEPFATHER SHOOTS GIRL; ENDS OWN LIFE

Syracuse, Sept. 3.—Michael A. Campbell shot Maude Lawton, his step-daughter, in front of No. 378 W. Onondaga street at 6:20 a. m. today, fired twice at men who tried to interfere and then shot himself.

Miss Lawton's recovery is uncertain. Campbell died two hours later.

The crime followed family troubles. Mrs. Campbell recently left her husband, after, she says, heh ad broken one of her ribs and otherwise injured her. Recently Campbell, who is the second husband, shot at her through the window of her room, No. 810 S. West st. He also tried to break into the house.

Miss Lawton lived at No. 138 Lincoln avenue with the Langley family. She and Ada Langley walked down West Onondaga street on their way to work.

Near Onondaga place Campbell came up to them.

"Now I've got you," he said.

He raised his revolver and fired at Miss Lawton. The bullet struck in her breast and lodged under the shoulder blade. She fell to the sidewalk.

AMERICANS KILLED BY MEXICAN RAIDERS

Brownsville, Texas.—A band of Mexican border raiders, desperate since the killing by an American posse of General Pascual Orozco today added two more to thel ist of murdered Amerians, burned a railroad bridge fourteen miles north of this city, fired thirty shots at an American aeroplane, and then eccaped. American cavalry and infantry sent in pursuit of the Mexicans came into contact with them but one. In an exchange of shots one Mexican was killed, but the other got away.

After burning the bridge the Mexicans attacked a small ranch house which was defended by two Americans. These men were captured and carrieda way. At daybreak their bodies were found in the bed of a dry lake twelve miles from here. The bodies were riddled withb ullets and horribly mutilated. The news of the finding of the bodies reached here about the same time that it was learned that the bridge had been burned. Troop trains were despatched at once from this city, Harlingen and San Benito, and it was men from one of these detachments thatc ame up with the band and killed one of the members.

SPOT CADY TO MEET JERRY CONNELLY TONIGHT

"Spot Cady" the Phoenix dredge worker meets Jerry Connelly tonight at the Arena in one of the four round bouts. Bobbie Shannon and "Kid" Crizier fight the main bout of six rounds for the bantam weight boxing crown of Central New York. Thirty-two rounds of boxing are schedlled in all.

Followers of the Phoenix boy are anxious to see Cady score a clean knockout in tonight's fray to set aside the doubt of whether Cady could have disposed of his oponent last week. "Young" Leach Cross, it will be remembered, quit last week claiming a foul. It was impossible to decide on this, however. Cady took considerable punishment last week and was well on his way towards scoring a victory when the lout was stopped.

JEWISH YOUNG MEN PROPOSE NATIONAL BODY

The first convention of the New York State Jewish Young Men's Association which includes all the associations of Jewish young men and their kindred bodies, will be held in Syracuse next Monday and Tuesday.

Meetings will be held at the Jewish Communal Home. The propaganda of the work of the state association will constitute the principal business to be considered.

One of the matters to be discussed is the formation of a National Association of Jewish Young Men's Associations. There will also be a discussio of Jewish problems growing out of the European war.

A feature of the convention will be a ball to be held on Monday night. Monday afternoon will be devoted to field events. Ball games will be played between teams representing Syracuse, Buffalo, Rochester, Albany and Utica.

Utica will send a large delegation and a warm fight is expected between that city and Rochester for the 1916 convention.

GERMAN WORKMEN BID FOR BIG WAR LOAN

Berlin, Sept. 2.—Prominent bankers and business men to whom I have talked are confident the third German war loan will be as great a success as were the two previous issues.

Among the reasons asigned for this belief were the greate conomic strength of the country and the recent successes of the German arms. There is a general atmosphere of confidence among all classes.

The rate at which the first two war loans were transferred never fell below the issuing price, but rather overstepped it. From the beginning the war loans have been regarded as splendid investments, and there has been a great demand to subscribe throughout Germany.

WADE E. GAYER.

WADE GAYER'S HAT REMAINS IN THE RING

The assertion made early this week in effect that Supervisor Wade E. Gayer has quit the ranks of candidates who may compete in next year's race for the county treasurership, is refuted by close political and social friends of the popular member of the Third ward Republican organization that he will be the Republican candidate to succeed Herman W. Kandt, is as certain as anything can be in politics.

City's Industrial Activity to Be Featured by Chamber of Commerce, Provided Manufacturers Cooperate With Division

If the plans of the Industries Division are carried out, Fulton will in all probability have an exhibit of articles "Made in Fulton." The manufacturers of Fulton yesterday received from the Industries Division of the Chamber of Commerce the following letter:

"The Industries Division of the Chamber of Commerce propose during the winter exhibit of products "Made in Fulton." By combining the products of the 35 or 40 manufacturing plants in the city the exhibit can be made most interesting and instructive.

"Such an exhibit would be of great advertising value to the city of Fulton and to the manufacturers represented. Even if there were no immediate tangible return to the exhibitors, such an exhibit would tend to make the citizens of Fulton appreciate their own home industries. Today probably not one citizen in ten knows how many varieties of manufactured articles are made here.

"Co-operation in this way means maximum advertising values and community good will at minimum cost.

Are you alive to a real opportunity?

"DIVISION OF INDUSTRIES."

From talks with several of the manufacturers it seems very probable that their cooperation can easily be secured. In fact, this morning's mail brought the first acceptance of the plan. If the exhibit develops, the Industries Division hope to make it so compact that it can be shipped to the State Fair, to the Rochester Industrial Exposition and possibly to other fairs or places of exhibition in the state. Such an exhibit would be a demonstration of the variety of products made in Fulton and also of the skill of Fulton's working men and women.

JUDGE'S IRE AROUSED BY MAN WHOSE SHAME ASTONISHED CROWD

"I don't know what type of a man you can be, but I certainly think you are very little better than a brute beast," said Judge Wilson this morning to the husband of Floretta Kelley, who was arrested on the circus grounds Thursday while engaged in selling indecent photographs of herself, while her husband stood close by on the lookout for policemen. "The thing you have asked and have allowed your wife to do is something inconceivable," said the Judge.

Kelley hung his head, while his wife wept bitterly. The Judge was hearing an application entered for a reduction of the fine of $200 imposed upon Mrs. Kelley for selling the obscene pictures. Hubert L. Gilman, attorney for Mrs. Kelley, told the court that Mrs. Kelley was engaged in the business in partnership with the circus company, who shared the profits. When she was arrested, however, the company refused to aid her, and she did not have $200 with which to pay the fine. After lengthy consideration the Judge reduced the fine to the minimum amount prescribed by statute, $50, and Kelley paid the money.

Mrs. Kelley was selling indecent photographs of herself for 25 cents each, and in some instances, wrote indecent verses on the reverse side of the photos. She tearfully promised this morning to give up the circus life and go home, and Kelley also promised not to allow his wife to degrade herself publicly in the future. Mrs. Kelley was first arraigned last night, and Judge Wilson at that time fined her $200, with the alternative of 200 days in jail.

MAYOR WOULD WELCOME "REVELATIONS" PROMISED BY ERRING MR. WILTSIE

Mayor F. E. Fox granted an interview to a Times reported today at noon and answered several of the leading questions of the day. The Mayor denied that his trip to Albany yesterday had anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the case of Commissioner A. W. Wiltsie, or the Firsts t. paving matter, and said his trip was in the interests of the city market plan. The Mayor's views on the matter are printed in another column.

"Has Commissioner Wiltsie resigned yet?" was the first question asked of the Mayor.

"I have heard nothing from the commissioner," said the Mayor. "In spite of his denial in The Times, I repeat, Commissioner Wiltsie did tell me he would resign, after my conversation with him on Tuesday last. When I told Mr. Wiltsie the reason he was objected to, namely, because the other members of the board considered him an obstructionist in everything and particularly on the First st. paving, especially after he had voted to widen the street, the commissioner said, "Well, I think it would be better if I resigned. I will resign." Those were his words. I made it plain to him that the administration considered his tactics on the board anything but just in view of the fact that the improvement he was ready to fight was to be a permanent one and in the best interests of the city at large!"

"I note in The Times that Mr. Wiltsie promises revelations. I invite Mr. Wiltsie to reveal anything he knows, as far as I am concerned, and I think the other members of the administration feel the same way about it."

Did Not Sell a Horse

"There is a rumor current to the effect that you will be impeached on two charges," the reported said. "One is—that you treated a charge of the Charities Bureau and turned in a bill of $50 to the city, and the other that you sold a horse to the city."

"There is absolutely no comparison between Mr. Wiltsie's case and mine," said the Mayor. "And anyone who cares to try to impeach me on those charges can start now. Any of my acts will stand publicity at any time. I never sold a horse to the city, and as for that other charge, there was absolutely nothing irregular."

"Are you going to remove Commissioner Wiltsie now? Have you any alternative but to remove him, now that he has violated the letter of the charter and you know it?" the Mayor was asked.

"I am not in a position to say what I am going to do," said the Mayor. "I haven't given the matter a great deal of thought. I cannot say whether or not Mr. Wiltsie will be removed."

"There is also a report in circulation to the effect that you tried to 'frame up' Mr. Wiltsie by telling Edward Styring to buy any pipe he needed from the Gilbert-Nicholas Company," the reported said.

No Frame Up

"That is anqualified falsehood," said the Mayor. "I wish you would tell me the man who said that. I never had any conversation with Mr. Styring about pipe or anyother material. The 'frame up' is all on the other side. Mr. Wiltsie solicited that business because he wanted it, if my sources of information are correct, and I did not know anything about it until the whole matter had been finished."

"Is it true that several members of the administration, including some who hold civil service positions, will resign if Mr. Wiltsie does not?" the Mayor was asked.

"I can't tell you that, either," said the Mayor, "because I don't know. I do know that several of those in office feel that Mr. Wiltsie should be removed, because of his antagonistic attitude to this improvement. They feel that Mr. Wiltsie has allied himself with Mr. Gage and Mr. Mason purposely to hold up this matter. Mr. Gage and Mr. Mason are not fighting this thing because of any public-spirited motives, but there are personal reasons behind it."

Not Seeking Office

"Are you going to run for reelection?"

"There is nothing to be said on that score," said the Mayor. "I didn't seek the office before and I'm not going to seek it now."

The Mayor denounced the attitude of the leaders in the fight against the paving of First st., and said some of the people who are fighting it would not even vote to pave the street if they thought it would raise their taxes. In his opinion, personal feelings against him because of some appointments he has made are responsible for the attitude of some of the opponents of the administration in the paving matter. The Mayor, in concluding the interview said the case of Mr. Wiltsie would probably be settled definitely at the next meeting of the Board of Public Works, which may be held Monday evening.

GETTING PUBLIC MARKET NOW UP TO THE PEOPLE, SAYS MAYOR F. E. FOX

"If the people of Fulton want a city market now is the time for them to show it," said Mayor Fox today. The Mayor had just finished telling a reporter for The Times of his trip to Albany yesterday in the interest of the establishment of a market here.

"In spite of the fact that several manufacturers in the vicinity of First and Oneida sts. want thatl and for their own use, there is very good reason to hope that the city may get the land. The manufacturers want the land, but it was understood that the city was to have first chance at the purchase of thel and when the canal was filled," said the Mayor. "The people can have the market if there is any demand for it."

"The market proposition seems to be up to the administration now, as I understand that the Chamber of Commerce has abandoned the idea. But, nevertheless, I feel sure that we can get the land if we want it."

V. C. LEWIS'S NAME LOOKS GOOD TO REPUBLICANS; COMMITTEE MEET TODAY

The annual meeting of the Republican City Committee for the purpose of selecting the party slate for the coming election was to have been held last night and in some quarters this morning it was reported that the meeting had been held. One of the committee, however, later denied this report and said the session last night had been postponed because of the illness of some of the members. He was of the opinion that a meeting might be called some time today.

The committeeman refused to give any clue to the identity of the probable candidate for the Mayoralty, although it is understood that the committee is strong for the nomination of V. C. Lewis.

"The members of the committee have been keeping their ideas to themselves," said the committeeman. "I don't know who will be put up for Mayor, and I don't care, so long as they nominate some one they can elect. I haven't heard that Mr. Lewis had been proposed and, personally, I don't know that he would run. We have talked of five or six different men, but none of them have said they will run.

"Is there any possibility of the committee indorsing Mayor Fox for re-election?" was asked.

"I don't beleive so," said the committeeman, "I don't think the Mayor wants to stand again. Furthermore, I believe it is impossible to re-elect any Mayor in this city. I don't believe it could be done, because a man in that office is bound to make enemies if he does anything."

"Are you in a position to forecast the aldermanic selections?" the committeeman was asked.

"No, I am not and I think it likely there will be some warm arguments along the line of those selections," he answered.

More Emancipating

There was scarcely a dissenting vote when the old ladies of the Ramsey county poor farm in Minnessota were asked whether they wanted a smoking room in the new $150,000 home being erected by the county. Mrs. Moore, the matron, says that if the dear old souls want the walls covered with pictures of pugilists, races and sporting men they shall have their wish. Ramsey county is going to make the old ladies happy and comfortable.

It occurs to us that as regards smoking the mothers with grown daughters are of the generation denied its "rights." The grandmother smoked if she chose and in great number she so chose. The custom created no scandal. The granddaughters are doing a little smoking, quite a little these days. She is asserting her rights and is embarrassed when restaurant and hotel kepers regard smoking as disorderly conduct. She doesn't smoke a pipe like grandmother, but cigarettes were not made when grandma acquired the habit of the weed. It is a little odd that a generation of emanicipation females should have preceded the present crusade for rights. When emanicipation returns shall we look for a female smoking a cigar as she saunters through the public square?—Watertown Standard.

Cheap Beef

For years now the people of the country have been living in hope as regards the price of beef. With each advance there seems to have been a feeling that some day outside competition, legislation or some other factor would step in and put a stop to the antics of the trusts. Such hope might just as well be laid aside.

During the course of an unusually comprehensive analysis of the subject of beef prices, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer shows that there is very little prospect that meat will ever be cheaper. Among the reasons given for this opinion are the following: During the past fifty years the number of beef cattle raised for market in proportion to the population has declined 50 per cent; the unlimited free range for cattle has gone; within an appreciable space of time the beef of the country will be raised and fed on farms highly valuable for the production of other crops, and the price will be based upon the cost of production under such conditions.

It is announced that the American feed manufacturers' association has decided upon a campaign to induce farmers to raise beef as a farm crop. Unless a great many farmers of the country can be won over to cattle raising, then the consumers of beef will be forced to adopt a standard of diet similar to that of the Europeans, who consider meat a luxury rather than a necessity.—Batavia News.

City Managership

Though he does not get into the newspapers as much as he used to, the city manager of Dayton, Ohio, presumably is making good by the tried-and-true process of sawing wood and keeping quiet. That the idea has not been discarded by other cities which wish to do things in a hurry-up fashion and at the same time be business-like about it, is seen in the recent offer made by Portland, Ore., to obtain General Goethals to manage that city.

The tale which comes out of the West relating to this particular incident is not without its savor of the spectacular, but at the same time it "listens well," as the Pennsylvania Dutchman would say. S. Benson, a wealthy timber man of Oregon, is backing a number of Portland business men in their efforts to bet the general to place his name on the dotted line, which will hold him as a city employe for a term of reasonable length. They are willing to pay him $25,000 a year and as Mr. Benson says, "We are paying our commissioners that now and we could afford to pay it to him."

Portland's offer is a good one, but it will require a very good man, indeed, to fill the bill. In fact, it is doubtful if the man who could run such a city and run itr ight could be obtained for much less. The duties of the city manager are onerous and he is held absolutely accountable for everything which goes wrong. When one looks upon a city as a large corporation with each taxpayer a stockholder who demands and insists on getting dividends, itc an be seen that the man whoh undertakes to manage the whole thing single-handed is tackling a proposition which requires an executive of a very high order. Such a man could doubtless command a much larger salary elsewhere.

GOING UP SOME

The great trouble one encounters in traveling along life's highway is caused by people "not thinking." Most of the tragedies and most of the errors of life are committed by people who "did not think." A business man says he had a good deal to do with the management of convicts once. He interviewed many prisoners, white and black. In every instance he said, the convict explained he committed the deed that caused his downfall thus: "I just didn't think!"

We speak harshly of people without thinking. We question motives without thinking. Too often we take the wrong road in business without thinking. We acquire foolish and deadly habits without thinking. Millions of wealth are squandered before the spender thinks. Usually thinking occurs after one's money has been squandered.

We take the wrong road in politics before thinking. We are too prone to look at only one side of a question before committing ourselves to a position. The weapon of the true thinker is information. Clear thinking cannot occur in the mind of one whose knowledge is spare.

Are you doing your thinking on the commission form of government for Fulton. It is to be voted on September 17. Have you thinking for you; it may affect the conten's of your pocket book in sized up the situation. Think! Do not let some one else do your the future. Every taxpayer is interested in the tax question. Your vote will help determine whether the elevator is "going up" or, "going down Mister." Think!

THE CRITICAL CYNIC

The laughter, the amusement, created by the cynic's pen is the mirth of a fiend and not of a friend. The story of Mephistopheles is satire; it shows the instincts of a diseased heart. The idea is infinitely ingenious in its evil effects, merciless in purpose; it blights and it blackens all of the humanities of life.

Constantly assuming an antagonistic position is proof of an unbridled passion to persecute and not to prosper. It is the revolutionary scheme of the smart writer against established institutions.

Some of these writers rise in their cleverness as the eagle, and carry the minds of smaller men in their talons; while others sting you like wasps.

Often the brighter mind is the two-edged sword of the hating cynic.

There is no surer way of finding a bad heart than to discover the writer who finds delight in dragging down, featuring the bad as representing theg ood, cunningly exaggerating single foibles into character. Many mistake this destructive, negative, analytical wit as humor.

Humor insinuates its fun into your heart. Wit is sarcastic and scornful.

There is never a time when I fail to see the frailties, the foibles, the mistakes of men. —Silent Partner Magazine.

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS

In Boston, where the Governor's Conference has just been held, Governor Capper of Kansas and ex-Governor Adams of Colorado spoke for the suffragists at a mass meeting.

Ex-Governor Adams declared that the preamble to the Federal Constitution was a "lie and a delusion" in those states that had not given suffrage to women.

In Bridgeport, Connecticut, 7000 girl strikers have won an eight hour day after enduring the hazards of a strike and loss of pay for two weeks.

In equal suffrage Washington, California and Arizona eight hours is the legal limit for the woman wage earner, and in this protection of women these states stand alone.

Dr. Aletta Jacobs, the first woman in Holland to ask for the right to vote, is visiting this country. In an interview in New York she said, that a great many members of the Dutch Parliment would like to have women in the Parliment, but did not want women to vote, whereas, in England, sheb elieved, that the attitude of Englishmen was, that they did not mind if women voted but they did not want women in Parliment.

"Despite its strong economy program," so runs the report of The Survey on the last Kansas Legislature, "it placed Kansas in the front ranks of the national welfare movement. The big gain was unquestionably due to woman suffrage."

"The women's organizations are to be congratulated on the success of their program for public welfare," writes Ernest W. Burgess of the University of Kansas.

The evil aspect of the industrial situation as revealed by the living and working conditions of the nation's wage earners, particuarly as affecting women and children, was the reason given in the second section of the Industrial Relations Commission's main report for recommending woman suffrage as one of the great remedies for the unwholesome conditions found in the commission's investigation of the cause of social unrest.

A little old lady was trotting by the anti-suffrage booth at an up-state fair the other day when the presiding lady handed her a tract headed: "Facts Show that Woman Suffrage Has Not Aided Prohibition." and asked her to don an anti-democracy button.

But the little old lady chanced to be a leading light in the local W. T. C. U. who knew that the only states that voted-in prohibition last November were the equal suffrage states of Washington, Oregon, Colorado and Arizona and she opened fire on her large opponent with such effect that the wily professional anti quickly turned to seek less well-armed foes to conquer.

European War Does Not Curtail Music

By Gustav A. Judd, Berlin, Germany

In some parts of the country the European war has injured almost every industry and profession, and music has suffered just as other lines, but generally war makes little difference to music. The war, of course, has taken away many musicians, but there are bands and orchestras abundant in all the cities of Europe. It is not only in the trenches where music stirs, but in the cities it has done more to stir patriotism than anything else. Everybody knows that. The people cannot get along without music. That is why I am an optimist.

The United States after the war doubtless will be the great music center of the world. It is true that we have to turn to the old world for our greatest musicians, particularly pianists, but Americans are learning, and in time some great pianists will be developed. There are some great musical organizations in this country. London has no such orchestra as the one in Boston, and probably the only one that surpasses it is in Berlin.

There was a time when the musician affected long hair, as if to prove his ability, but that time has passed. A musician must have temperament, of course, but temperament does not cause insanity or eccentricity, necessarily. The musician must be intellectual. It takes three or four generations to make a great instrumentalist.

Those who criticize the most when the weather is disagreeable have little praise to offer when a day calling for joy and thanksgiving bursts forth from heaven.

Some Don'ts When You Advertise

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

THE price of the gun never hits the bull's eye.
And the bang seldom rattles the bells.
It's the hand on the trigger that cuts the real figger.
The aim's what amounts—that's what makes record counts—
Are you hitting or just wasting shells?

Don't forget that the man who writes your copy is the man who aims your policy.

When you stop to reflect what your space costs and that the wrong talk is just noise—bang without biff—you must see the necessity and sanity of putting the right man behind the gun.

Don't tolerate an ambition on your adman's part to indulge in a lurking desire to be a literary light.

People read his advertising to discover what your buyers have just brought from the market and what you are asking for "O. N. T." They buy the newspaper for information and recreation and are satisfied with the degree of poetry and persiflage dished up in its reading columns.

Don't exaggerate. Poetic licenses are not valid in business prose. The American people don't want to be humbugged and the merchant who figures upon too many fools finds himself looking into a mirror, usually about a half hour after the sheriff has come to look over the premises.

Don't imitate. Advertising is a special measure garment. Businesses are not built in ready-made sizes. Copy which fits somebody else's selling plans won't fit your store without sagging at the chest or riding up at the collar. Duplicated argument and duplicated results are not twins. Your policy of publicity must be specially measured from your policy of merchandising.

Don't put your advertising in charge of an amateur. Let somebody else stand the expense of his educational blunders. Remember you are making a plea before the bar of public confidence. Your adwriter is an advocate. Like a bad lawyer, he can lose a good case by not making the most of the facts at hand.

Don't get the "sales" habit. "Sales" are stimulants. When held too often their effect is weakening. The merchant who continually yells "bargain" is like the old hen who was always crying "fox." When the real article did come along, none of her chicks believed it.

Don't use fine print. Make it easy for the reader to find out about your business. There are ten million pairs of eyeglasses worn in America, and every owner of them buys something.

And Don't start unless you mean to stick. The patron saint of the successful advertiser hates a quitter.

W. C. T. U. NOTES

(Complied by Local Union)

An individual somewhat prominent, in public life, in a recent speech, questioned the value of state-wide prohibition. His attack called forth the following statements from the governors of four of our long time prohibition states:

Hon. Fred O. Blue, prohibition commissioner of West Virginia, vouches for the statement that since prohibition went into effect, Jully 1, 1914, there has been a fifty per cent. decrease in crime, and a seventy-five per cent. decrease in drunkenness.

I think one of the greatest blessings ever bestowed upon this state, and the law which is doing more than any other to makeg oodm en and women and to bring prosperity and happiness to the people of Kansas, is the amendment to the constitution prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors. It may truthfully and fairly be said that prohibition has been on trial in Kansas for a sufficient time to give adequate evidence of its merit and demerits. And at the end of nearly a generation under prohibition in this state, it may be said that the prohibitiory law has never been so well enforced as now, and never before so generally approved by the people toward this provision of the state constitution. Most of them are enthusiastically in favor of it. It is the portion of the fundamental law of the state nearest to their hearts.

When the delegates to the national osteopathic convention entered the blue room of the Multnomah hotel at Portland, Oregon, prepared to enjoy a banquet, it is said they stepped back in angry surprise at the sight that met their eyes. One who was present reports that on the long banquet table, at each plate, was placed a cocktail, cooled with chipped ice and topped off with a dainty maraschino cherry. The liquid ingredients contained a strong amount of alcohol. The osteopathic physicians demanded of the hotel management an explanation.

"We thought we would be real hospitable to you people because you have had such a fine convention and have been such good fellows," was the hotel manager's excuse.

However, according to the report, the explanation did not satisfy the abstemious delegates and they refused to seat themselves at theb anquet tables until every cocktail was removed. By which act, they showed themselves to be up-to-date scientists!

GARDENS IN LARGE CITIES

No Reason Why Certain Difficulties Shrould Not Easily Be Overcome, With Proper Thought.

There are a few things that must be provided if Omaha is to become famous for its gardens, and it is to be hoped that the agricultural expert who is coming here will attend to them, says the Omaha World-Herald. There would be many more gardens if there were some central agency established where men too busy to attend to all the work could call by telephone and get a reliable man when one is needed. The charity organizations have been relied upon, but the men who seek work through them are often inefficient and unreliable. One business man said: "I have quite a large bit of ground in my back yard that I would like to put in a garden, but I cannot take a day off to spade it up and prepare the ground for the seed. I would be glad to plant the seed and care for the ground afterward. Last year I tried getting a man and after much worry got one. He was unreliable and the work that he did was hardly worth the time looking after him, so this year I have concluded to seed it down and avoid that sort of worry."

The plan for children is good and should be boosted by every one, but a large number of gardens would be planted where there are no children if there were a place where the right kind of help could be secured. Lawns would be kept in better condition if a man could be called by telephone when a mower was out of order or needed sharpening and when bulbs and shrubbery were to be planted.

Omaha gardens and beautiful lawns would add very much to the city in the satisfaction of citizens and visitors and to the value of property. It might be a good policy for some of the civic organizations to undertake to supply this want by establishing such a central agency. There is no doubt that it would be a paying enterprise.

FLOWERS IN CONCRETE WALLS

Monotony of Driveway Relieved by Device of Designer Who Gave Thought to Subject.

In designing a residence driveway which was to be cut through a terrace, a builder avoided the monotony of having two long concrete retaining walls flanking either side by breaking them at intervals with semicircular niches in which plants could be placed. These spaces were made so that they broke what otherwise would have been the straight line of the two copings. Each was made about 3 feet in depth and 3 feet wide and given the same finish as the exterior walls. Concrete jardinieres were made for the plants which were set in the spaces.—Popular Mechanics.

Making the Town Worth Living In.

The following, from the pen of Judge Nelson Case of Oswego, applies to any Kansas town: "Taxes paid for good roads, for libraries and schools, for any improvement which adds to the comfort, the enlightenment, the happiness of a people, are among the most valuable investments a person can make, even though he cannot see that he has any direct interest in them. The most prosperous cities are those whose inhabitants have the most advantages for education, religious culture, recreation and such amusements and diversions as are elevating in their tendencies, and are free from demoralizing influences. Kansas City is a fine example of this spirit and policy. It is what her citizens have done to make the city beautiful and a desirable place in which to live, fully as much as her direct efforts to secure trade, that has given her the prestige she enjoys."—Kansas City Star.

Manuring the Soil.

In garden making the first essential is a heavy layer of barnyard manure placed on the surface and then turned under as deeply as it is possible to get it. If a lot has to be filled three or four feet in depth, it should first be covered with two feet of barnyard manure, on top of which should be placed two feet of good soil. When all has been settled by the rains of one winter we will have a garden "as is a garden." This illustration is used merely to show where manure should be placed if it be possible to get it there. A garden so filled in would grow roses and other flowering shrubs that would prove little short of marvelous.

Cut the Weeds and Grass.

Whether you are a renter or an owner, you should not permit grass and weeds to "take" the sidewalk. Flies and mosquitoes bred in the tangled grass of a home owner are just as annoying and poisonous as those that are brought to life on the rented premises. And the blow to civic beauty is as severe in the one instance as in the other. Don't be a drawback to comfort, health and civic beauty, which is to say, don't let weeds and grass encumber the sidewalk of the place that you call home.—Corsicana Sun.

LAST CIVIL WAR VETERAN IN U. S. ARMY RETIRES.

Colonel Clem, "Drummer Boy of Chickamauga," Reaches Age Limit.

The last of the civil war veterans in the active service of the army has retired. Colonel John L. Clem, the "Drummer Boy of Chickamauga," has reached the age limit and retired as a brigadier general.

When President Lincoln issued his first call for volunteers, Johnny Clem, a ten-year-old orphan, offered his services to the Third Ohio volunteers, but he was told to go home.

Johnny, however, hid on one of the cars taking the regiment to the mobilization camp, and when the troops arrived he crawled out and asked the colonel for a drum and a pair of sticks.

He was turned down and thereupon offered his services to the Twenty-third Michigan regiment. Some of the soldiers rigged him up in a uniform and gave him a sawed off gun. Eventually he got a drum.

He was under fire for the first time at Chickamauga. The command was surrounded by Confederates and the drummer boy was found in a cluster of bushes by a Confederate officer, who laughed heartily at the diminutive figure. Thereupon Johnny shot at the officer and escaped.

His fame spread from that day and he was known thereafter as the "Drummer Boy of Chickamauga." He was in the thick of the fighting in half a dozen other important battles, and made such an impression on General Thomas and General Rosecrans that they reported him to General Grant for meritorious service. When General Grant was elected president he gave young Clem a commission in the regular army, where he has gradually risen to his present rank.

The "L" in Colonel Clem's name stands for Lincoln.

"I met President Lincoln in 1864," Colonel Clem explained, "and I thought so much of him that I took his name as a middle name."

SUBSTITUTE FOR COTTON.

Germans Use Wood Pulp to Make Explosives by New Process.

A citizen of a neutral state who has just made a tour through Germany gives to the London Chronicle an account of the work of German chemists in discovering a substitute for cotton as a basis for high explosives. This is found in the shape of ordinary wood pulp. The correspondent adds:

"The experiments still are being carried on, but sufficient progress has been made to enable the substitute to be used freely and successfully.

"Germany is under no difficulty so far as the supply of raw material is concerned. At one time she was dependent upon Scandinavia for supplies of wood pulp, but some years ago she set herself to the task of making her own. Since then she became largely self supporting in this direction. Three of the largest factories are engaged in turning out the new basis for explosives.

"Large reserves of timber have been accumulated from my own country and from Russia, so that there is no fear of any shortage. I was assured that if the supply of raw cotton to Germany was stopped entirely she might be able to tide over the difficulties."

Experience takes dreadfully high school wages, but he teaches like no other.—Carlyle.

FITTING ALIENS AS USEFUL CITIZENS

Bureau of Naturalization Tries to Solve Problems.

STATISTICS PROVE AMAZING

During the Eight Years of Federal Supervision 2,500,000 Foreigners Have Asked For Citizenship, and Over Half of These Signify Intention of Attempting to Take Out Their Papers.

Washington.—Nearly 2,500,000 foreigners have asked for citizenship during the first eight and three-quarter years of federal supervision of the naturalization law, according to a statement issued by the bureau of naturalization of the department of labor. Nearly 1,750,000 of these have declared their intention or taken out their first papers. Something over 750,000 have asked for final papers, and of these about 650,000 have been admitted to citizenship. During the same period upward of 85,000 foreigners have been refused permission to citizenship, over one-half of these because of mental and moral unfitness.

While the foregoing figures indicate a large number coming forward for citizenship, says the bureau, the number does not appear relatively very large when it is known that in 1910 there were nearly 14,000,000 foreigners in this country, that of this number 9,000,060 were not citizens and that the foreign body has been increased nearly 1,000,000 annually since then. By far the larger portion of the foreign residents have retained their allegiance to the sovereignty of their birth, and, as it appears, many of these are ready to respond to the call of these sovereignties. Many have gone back who had declared their intention.

ANTHONY CAMINETTI, COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION.

Some of them afterward returned and presented themselves for admission. Judges of the naturalization courts have held that such absence from this country in the armies and fighting under their native allegiance broke the continuity of residence for naturalization purposes and denied their applications.

Among the approximately 14,000,000 foreign alien residents, 1,650,361 are classed as illiterate. These are the natural prey of the designing and scheming foreigners and natives as well at every turn. They compel them to pay tribute, both in cash and blood, for every service, both real and imagined, and in the gratification of their desires, however unscrupulous or unnatural. For years this condition has been studied by the bureau of naturalization in its application to the administration of law. It is safe to say that, although 85,000 foreigners have been refused citizenship because of mental and moral unfitness, at least that many have been admitted in spite of these deficiencies during the period of federal supervision. The courts have been reluctant to refuse citizenship to a candidate even though he be ignorant of our institutions or of the privileges conferred upon him. Especially is this so where there are no facilities offered by the cities and towns where the petitioners live for overcoming these defects. In many places the public schools have, under the inspiration of the bureau, opened their doors to the foreigner and taught him the duties of citizenship, and in these places the courts have refused citizenship unless the candidates could come up to the higher standard brought about by federal supervision. These have been tried with success.

During the last year over 335,000 foreigners declared their intention and petitioned for naturalization. This is the high water mark since federal supervision. The federal census shows that the foreign population is many times greater than the number who come forward for citizenship. In many states the proportion of candidates for citizenship is at the lowest ebb. In no state does it exceed 50 per cent, while in some states it is as low as 2 per cent. This is true of the number of foreigners who take out their first papers and those who become citizens.

KILLS SNAKE; SAVES GIRL.

Collie Dies From Poison After Making Heroic Fight.

Caldwell, N. J.—Don, a collie dog owned by John Miller of Fairfield avenue, West Caldwell, gave up his life to save the six-year-old daughter of his master from an attack by a copperhead snake. The dog managed to kill the snake, but died two hours later from poison.

Agnes Miller and her older sister, Clara, started out for a romp with Don. They were making for a small clump of woods not far from their home, with the dog close at their heels. The dog suddenly sprang forward, gave a growl and leaped upon a good sized copperhead snake directly in the path of the little girl.

The older girl saw Don tackle the snake, and she seized her little sister and pulled her away from the reptile. Both the girls then ran home as fast as they could and told their father of the adventure. Don got back to the house, but died soon afterward.

Miss Clara Miller said that if the dog had not tackled the snake just at the moment her little sister would have been bitten by the reptile, which was not more than three feet from her at the time.

CZARINA ACTIVE AS RED CROSS NURSE

Two Daughters Also Tireless In Aid of Russian Hospitals.

AUTHOR SEES THEM WORK.

Took Three Months' Course and Is Now Doing Active Service—Two Hundred Soldiers and Thirty Officers Are Being Treated at Base In Which Her Majesty Serves.

Petrograd.—The Russian Red Cross is bearing a tremendous burden. Its self sacrifice, endurance, efficiency and democracy astonish the world. All classes have striven to do "their bit."

About fifteen miles from Petrograd there is a little town, the "Windsor" of the czar of Russia. A year ago court carriages, beautiful ladies, well groomed men thronged the streets of this place. All was sunshine and glitter.

Then the storm came. All Russia rose to fight her enemy. The life of that little village and of the empire changed entirely.

Everybody felt the seriousness of the situation. Russian women came to assist their husbands and brothers, and at their head came the czarina herself.

Her majesty and her two elder daughters, Olga and Tatiana, went to a lady doctor, Princess Gedroyc, and asked to be instructed in the art of nursing the wounded. They entered on a three months' course and passed examinations like any other professional nurses. Every day for three months Princess Gedroyc trained these three imperial sisters of the Red Cross for their examinations.

"I felt exceedingly honored," writes Waclaw Czerniewski, "when her majesty gave me permission to visit on several occasions her hospital and to see her work. Moreover, she gave me personally her portrait. Never before had any journalist been admitted to this hospital. Modesty is characteristic of her majesty. She works quietly and laboriously. The hospital where the czarina and her imperial daughters work every day from 9 a. m. until 2 p. m. accommodates 200 soldiers and thirty officers and has a well arranged operating theater, a commodious surgical dressing ward, well equipped X ray research and laboratory.

"At the head of the staff is Princess Gedroyc, a woman of strong character, who, with the help of two male doctors and several sisters, including the imperial nurses, carries on her arduous task with energy and devotion. The czarina and her daughters obey Princess Gedroyc like the other sisters, and indeed she does not make any difference between them, her sole endeavor being the alleviation of human suffering. During operations Princess Gedroyc gives orders to the czarina, who as her assistant hands her the necessary instruments."

Modern Life.

"Formerly a girl took pride in accumulating linen for her linen chest."

"Well?"

"Now she collects a lot of phonograph records."—Kansas City Journal.

TRICKING SUBMARINES.

Ruses by Which Vessels May Escape Their Torpedo Attacks.

It is the surprise attack which in nearly every case enables a submarine to torpedo a hostile ship. There are several maneuvers by means of which a ship can trick a submarine. Several vessels have diverted torpedoes by swinging round their stern until it points in the direction of the undersea craft. In this way the wash of the propellers has deflected the torpedo from its course and it has sped harmlessly past its mark. Another successful ruse is to stoke up the furnaces of a ship chased by a submarine, and thick, black smoke belches from its funnels and envelops the vessel in a protective shroud. In this way the submarine gunners are confused and cannot perceive the correct direction in which to send their torpedo.

A speedy ship which follows an erratic, zigzag course presents a poor mark to a submarine. When a torpedo is dispatched against a fast traveling vessel it is directed to a point just ahead of its mark, and the craft literally runs into the death dealing device. This obviously cannot happen, however, if a ship is swinging rapidly from side to side and alternately pointing the narrow expanse of its bows or stern to the undersea marksmen.

A submarine seldom attacks a vessel if it is not alone, for it can only attack one at a time, and while it is launching a torpedo at its first mark the second vessel has an excellent opportunity of ramming the submarine, which can be located by its telltale periscope.—Pearson's Weekly.

THE ENTRANCE HALL.

Make It Suit Not Visitors, but the Occupants of the Home.

Is anything new to be said about the entrance hall? The smallest room in most houses, it is usually given in the plans an amount of attention that might seem out of all proportion to the rest of the house. And yet the ordinary entrance, whether it be a mere vestibule, a spacious hall of the colonial style or, as in our present day fashions, a part of the living room set off by an archway, is quite unsatisfactory. It is unsatisfactory for this reason—that the entrance way is designed and decorated from the standpoint of the impression it makes on visitors, whereas the impression we should seek is not that made upon guests, but upon ourselves, the occupants of the house.

Too often we give the entrance a severe treatment that impresses the student of beauty or that amazes the less discriminating visitor by the other extreme of lavish display. But how does either of these two types of entrance affect those who come into the house many times every day, the good man and his good wife and their children? Is it a room that by its suggestion of rest and repose tempts one after a hard day's work at the office to drop into the first easy chair that comes along, or does it irritate the nerves and keep one going, restless and uneasy, wandering from the entrance to the living room and from the living room to the study and thence to the attic by way of the basement?—Good Health.

Suppressing Swearing.

Profane as well as legal oaths have been the subject of many parliamentary measures in England. No fewer than five separate bills having the prevention of swearing for their object were presented during the reign of James I., but it was not until 1623 that an enactment was finally carried defining and controlling the offense. In 1635 a public department was established to collect the fines enforced by this law. The officials of this department, of whom one was appointed in every parish, were allowed 2s. 6d. in the pound on the money thus collected, and the balance was paid over to the bishop for the benefit of the deserving poor. These penalties ceased to be enforced after the restoration, but were revived by a statute of William and Mary and still further increased under George II.

Stereoscopic Surveying.

There is in use a stereoscopic method of photographic surveying. Photographs are taken at two points with a surveying camera, the plates being exposed in the vertical plane passing through both stations. The developed plates, or positives from them, being then placed in a stereoscopic measuring machine that combines the pictures, a brief calculation gives the exact position of any desired point. The effective range of the instrument is put at about five miles, and the method is said to be of particular advantage in mapping large areas of mountainous country.

IS THIS GOOD BUSINESS?

The City Administration Borrowed Money on a Note in anticipation of the collection of the 1913 Sprinkling Tax. It is a Reasonable Presumption that the Taxes were collected from the People.

BUT The Note Remains Unpaid!

What was done with the Money Collected from the People?

Legally, that Money could have been applied to Only One Purpose—the payment of the Note.

THE NOTE REMAINS UNPAID!

COMMISSIONERS MAKE KNOWN RESULT OF SEPT. 1 MEETING

Editor Fulton Times,

Dear Sir:—Believing that attempts have been made to misrepresent the attitude and sentiment of the property owners abutting on First st., who will have to bear the principal burden of expense of repaving under present arrangement; further believeing that such property owners should have some voice in the matter of paving; further believing that the attitude of the Board of Works is to entirely ignore and override the wishes of such property owners, we, Special Commissioners, designated by the property owners, as provided for in the City Charter, believe that the city at large is entitled to know the facts—FIRST HAND. Therefore, we submit the following statement of a meeting of the First st. property owners held at the residence of Dr. C. R. Lee the evening of September 1st, at 8 o'clock P. M., with no other comment than to verify its accuracy:

KOPAS GIVEN ANOTHER TRIAL

Judge Wilson's Heart Softened to Plea of Bright Girl and Wayward Pole Escapes a Jail Sentence.

Thomas Kopas, arrested for intoxication by Officer Smith last night, was arraigned in City Court this morning before Judge Wilson, and principally because of the intercession of his wife, and the efforts of a bright little Polish girl who acted as interpreter, was given a suspended sentence of 30 days and allowed to look for work. Kopas was arrested about a week ago for cutting the tires on a bicycle belonging to another Pole, but effected a compromise with his countryman and escaped punishment.

A little Polish girl, tastefully dressed, came with Mrs. Kopas to the hearing this morning and explained to Judge Wilson that Mrs. Kopas and her children were in danger of starving if Kopas was sent to jail. Every one in the court room was favorably impressed by the child, who spoke both Polish and English fluently, and after she told the Judge her fears for the Kopas children, His Honor decided to give the man another trial. Kopas was a little inclined to take the affair as a joke and began to get flippant after he learned he would not be sent to jail. He was sternly rebuked by the Judge and ordered to go to work at once and support his children.

"That fellow is becoming Americanized a little too rapidly," said the Judge after Mr. and Mrs. Kopas, accompanied by their youthful interpreter, had left the court room.

MECHANICS LOSE TOURNEY; MUST DINE I. O. O. F.

For the past six weeks two teams comprising members of the O. U. A. M. and the Odd Fellows have been engaged in a pool tourney. Fifteen members of each order formed a team and the tourney, which was played alternately at the O. U. A. M. hall and Odd Fellows' temple, on a 50-point game basis, resulted in a victory for the Odd Fellows.

According to the terms of the tourney, the losing side will be the hosts at a supper which will be given at the O. U. A. M. hall September 9. Invitations are cordially extended to all members of both the American Mechanics and the Odd Fellows and the affair will not be restricted to the pool teams. A bountiful repast will be served, there will be speeches, music and exhibition pool contests.

GOVERNOR WHITMAN REFUSES AN INCREASE

Albany, Sept. 4.—From all over the state today come congratulatory messages to Governor Whitman because ofh is stand on the proposal to make his salary $20,000 beginning January 1, 1916, was on the order of final passage when the executive sent a letter to the convention requesting that it not be raised above $10,000, the present figure, until after his term expires January 1, 1917. The proposal was hastily changed with the intention of conforming with his wishes, but instead of doing this all salary for him was eliminated.

When Majority Leader Wickersham attempted to correct the error tonight, Lemuel E. Quigg sought to make the increase effective next January. He declared that any man big enough to be Governor could earn $5,000 in private life.

Mr. Wickersham said he concurred with what Mr. Quigg said but that as the Governor had raised the point himself, the convention should respect his wishes. The proposal was amended accordingly andw ill come up for final consideration tomorrow.

STATE'S GREAT WALNUT GROVE

Largest Group of Trees Outside of California Had Small Beginning—400 Bushels This Year.

Avon, N. Y., Sept. 3.—The largest commercial English walnut grove in America, outside of California, is located in Avon, and among the men prominent in the Nut Growers' Association meting in Rochestert his week is the owner of the orchard, Adelbert Thompson, of this village, whose 12-acre grove is this year going to produce between three and four hundred bushels of as fine English walnuts as are grown anywhere on the face of the earth.

The story of how Mr. Thompson happened to drift into English walnuts is rather an interesting one. When he was a great deal younger than he is now by thirty years or more, Mr. Thompson says he caught the California fever. A professor McHenry had written that all that a man needed tom ake a fortune was to come to California, plant a hundred acres of English walnuts, which thrive there, wait a few years and then do nothing but watch the money come in.

But there were many things which held Mr. Thompson at home. To start with, they could not sell the farm. One day in May, 1886, he went to Rochester. He had business at the old Powers bank, and while standing awaiting his turn, he saw a man come in, and throwd own on the counter a dozen English walnuts which he said he had just picked and that they were grown in Rochester.

Although Mr. Thompson appeared "doomed" to stay in the Genesee Valley, he had not yet lost hope that some day he would be growing English walnuts, so he walked up, introduced himself, and in turn learned that the man was Dr. Redner, whoc ame from out Webster way. The doctor told him that the walnuts came from two trees at the corner of Emerson street and Lake avenue, Rochester. He accordingly hastened out there, where he saw the two trees, each bearing. One, the largest and older, was, he was told, of the straight English walnut variety, and it had already borne several bushels. The other, and smaller tree, was of the English Grenoble family, from France and it had that year borne abouta bushel of very superior nuts. Realizing that if these nuts would thrive near a city pavement, that they would no doubt do wonderfully well int he fertile soil on his farm, he conceived the idea of trying them out on his Avon farm, which lies just east and north of Avon, near the Monroec ounty line, and before he left he was the owner of eight hundred oft hese French, English Grenoble nuts, which cost him one cent apiece or $8 in all.

That day a car loaded with California products passed through Rochester and hev isited it, and received much information as to their planting and future care, and he came back Avon and made preparations for their planting.

How They Were Started

First a long trench was dug, and the 800 walnuts were covered up, and when opened it was found that 300 of them had sprouted. They were planting corn in a twelve-acre lot almost west of the big farmhouse, right along the Rochester road. Every forty-one feet they pulled out the corn, set a stake and planted a walnut. These were cultivated for several years and finally they began tog row.

In 1890 in the same lot he planted 900 peach trees and 200 plum trees, and while most oft hese fruit trees have long since gone, for many years they, too, proved wonderful orchards, and produced lots of the money which made it possible to wait twenty-eight years on the return from the walnuts. Eight years after this, the lot was seeded and pastured in order to check the growth of the peach trees, which threatened to wipe out the the less sturdy English walnuts. However, they kept growing, and two years ago they produced their first crops, over a hundred bushels of splendidly flavored walnuts being gathered, which sold at about 35 cents per pound on the Rochester market.

In the orchard, as Mr. Thompson calls it still, are 225 trees, and this year each will bear from one to five bushel. From a distance the trees resemble the common horse chestnut although they arec onsiderably darker. Just after a rain when the trees and the nuts are glistening in the sun there is no prettier farm picture anywhere than this orchard. The bark is very light, but gradually darkens as the tree reaches maturity. Many of the trees are forty feet high, and forty feet across and Mr. Thompson says that as far as hec an see the only mistake hem ade was in setting them too close together, and not setting out enough of them.

Not so Large as Others

The nuts do not run as large as the California nut, but are said to be vastly superior in flavor, and a noted grower of English walnuts in California has recently said that the flavor, not thes ize should govern the prize, which it probably will in the next few years. The nuts enclosed in a small shuck hang in bunches of two, three and four, and are about the size of small eggs. They smell much like the common black walnut, but the shuck does not stain the hands.

The crop will be harvested about the 1st of October, after the first frost. The men will pass down the rows with long poles, and beat the trees, knocking the walnuts off. It happens that most of the nuts grow in the uppermost part of the tree and a long pole is necessary. In hitting the ground, the shuck, which is very thin, falls off and the nuts are then picked up and taken to the house to dry, after which they will be taken to market. They run about thirty-five lbs. to a bushel, and as the price is from 25 to 35 cents a pound, this crop on Mr. Thompson's farm will bring him in from $7 to $10 a bushel and will in all probability bring him in between $2,500 and $3,000.

Mr. Thompson states that the tree from which he gets his first English walnuts, in Rochester, has been gone for years and that another tree has taken its place.

OSWEGO NORMAL OPENS NEXT TUESDAY

Oswego, Sept. 4.—With over eighty applications filed alli ndications point to the reception of one of thel argest entrance classes in the history of the State Normal and Training school at the opening of the Fall term. Although the activities will start at the school on Tuesday morning at nine o'clock when the members of the training class will meet Superintendent of the training school, William A. Maddox, and proparations for opening of the training department made, school will not officially open until Thursday morning.

Wednesday at 9:30 students will course with Professor Joseph C. Park, while others will register with Dr. Richard K. Piez and Miss Kate Hayes. Students will at this time also receive their programs.

The opening exercises when the members of the faculty will formally welcome the members of the entrance class, will occur on Wednesday morning at 9:30. The remainder of the day will be devoted to recreation and the new students allowed to inspect the building.

The teachers will meet the class and the regular work will be started Thursday morning.

Probably one of the features at the school the coming term will be the open air department under the direction of Miss Mary Farley. Dr. William A. Maddox, father of the open air school here, plans to introduce many new features in this department.

JOSEPH THOMPSON, THE CITY'S HONEST MAN

Diogenes with his lantern would have no trouble finding an honest man in Fulton. Indeed, Diogenes wouldn't need his lantern at all,—a want adv. in the Evening Times would serve him better. It served Mrs. C. E. Stevens of 405 Worth st. when she lost her gold watch a few days ago.

Mrs. Stevens asked this newspaper to tell of her lost watch, and Mr. Joseph Thompson of Hannibal st., found the watch, saw the lost adv. in the Times and returned the watch to its owner.

Mr. Thompson refused the reward offered; Mrs. Stevens' gratitude is unlimited and the Times is happy in having served.

A trial subscription for The Evening Times costs little and gives you much in return. It is the people's paper. adv

ROBERT HILLIARD'S Extraordinary Success
A FOOL THERE WAS
A Dramatization of Kipling's World-wide Poem "THE VAMPIRE" by Porter Emerson Browne
"THERE are two roads through life—even as there are two loves; the one is rough and weary and on it happiness seldom treads, that's the road of the White Rose."
A fool there was and he made his prayer,
(Even as you and I!)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair
(We called her the woman that did not care)
But the fool called her his lady fair.
(Even as you and I!)
"BUT the road of the Red Rose! That is different. There the flowers bloom, birds sing. There comes the soft wash of the sea, the silent whispers of the breeze—The call of love! Which road do you choose? My fool, which rose?"

B. P. O. E. LODGE TO BENEFIT BY SHOW

Manager Darleigh has again demonstrated his wisdom in bringing to this city a company of entertainers whose performance of Robert Hillard's big success, "A Fool There Was," has won the praises of critics in other cities. "A Fool There Was" is announced to appear here Tuesday evening next.

Quick always to take advantage of a good proposition, the local B. P. O. E. No. 830, has secured the Hillard play for a benefit performance and every indication points to a house crowded to its capacity.

Inherent in human nature seems to be the joy in evil at work—else why the inevitable structure of the drama? This may account for the tremendous success of "A Fool There Was" as dramatized from Kipling's "The Vampire." If this is the cause, then there is no dearth of drawing quality in this somewhat weird though fascinating play. The happily married man suddenly sees in the "vampire" something insidiously fascinating and yields only to sink to fearful depths. Yet there is pure love, the forgiving wife, the sincere and honored friend—but the "vampire's" power of evil is the stronger than all these. This is depicted in "A Fool There Was."

The present cast will be made up of artists especially engaged for their exceptional ability. The entire production is characterized by a lavish expenditure of money and a close attention to detail which make it an extraordinary example of the modern tendency toward the beautiful and representative in dramatic art.

FIRE DEPARTMENT HOSE WAGON GOT BUMP

A serious accident was narrowly averted this afternoon in First st. when a large touring car crashed into the Fire Department hose wagon. The automobile shot out of Cayuga st. and into the rear of the hose wagon with such force as to unbalance the driver, but not enough to throw the horses. The car contained five men passengers, Italians, who gave Oswego as their home. The chauffeur refused to give his name. He denied liability for the accident, but witnesses of the affair claim the party came through Cayuga st. at an excessive rate of speed, following a few feet behind another auto. As the first auto reached the corner of Cayuga and 1st sts., it was obliged to come to a stop on account of a passing trolley car. The Oswego car, to prevent running into the other auto swerved to one side, and narrowly missed the trolley, and ran into the Fire Department wagon. The rear of the wagon was somewhat damaged, but will not have to be taken out of service.

FORD GIVES CLERKS CHANCE AFTER PLOT

In order that they may not have a "black mark" on their lives through their plot to steal hundreds of profit-sharing checks, three young clerks in the accounting department of the Ford Motor company will be given another chance by Henry Ford. The youths—Frederick Clark, 22 years old, formerly of Milton, Pa., Edward Harper, an office boy, 17 years old, and Henry Aubrey, 26 years old—still were in the Highland Park police station on Monday and ignorant of the plans their employer had worked out for their salvation.

The price the youths must pay for escaping prosecution is work—hard work, and penty of it—in the Ford machine shops. This is a part of the reformation policy of Mr. Ford.

It is significant, too, that when they start in their reformation they will be rubbing elbows with laborers who are being paid $5 a day, which is more than they were receiving in the Ford offices.—Philadelphia Ledger.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper; but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

The Chinese God

Part It Played In a Rejected Lover's Revenge

By RALPH COBINO

Copyright by Frank A. Munsey Co.

Arkeld moved about his room studying detail. The arrangement of the flowers did not please him, and he rang for his man.

"This is right in coloring," he said to the servant, "not in design. Oh, your best doubtless"— He checked apologies with a gesture. "Now work under my supervision."

The result was bizarre, startling; a mass of outrageous bloom in a quiet room, for the room was quiet; it breathed repose and stillness, hinted even at monotony.

Arkeld nodded to himself, well pleased with the effect.

His eyes fell upon the only ornaments in the room, two small models of Chinese gods which stood upon the chimney piece.

His hand caressed one of the grinning models. With a whimsical movement he stooped and whispered to it:

"Tell Stella that there is another woman in the heart and mind of Godfrey Liston. Be sure and give Stella the message."

Then his guests—a Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey Liston—were announced.

They were a handsome couple, distinguished in manner.

The lady's eyes took in at one glance the arrangement of the room and of the flowers. She said quickly:

"Here you have artistic charm. Only why introduce alien things?"

"You mean the flowers?"

"These particular flowers and their arrangement."

Dinner was announced, and the talk became trivial, leaving subtleties.

The meal was excellently cooked and served. Stella noted the details, approving them.

She thought of the days when she had been engaged to Arkeld. She thought also of the day when she had met Godfrey Liston.

Love had swept her off her feet when she met Liston. Whereas Arkeld—she had always feared Arkeld!

Fear had gone masked as love. Fear had been in all her thoughts of Arkeld when she wrote to tell him that she could not marry him—in fact, that she was going to marry Liston.

She had imagined to herself Arkeld's reception of this letter.

The fear that was within her portrayed something which would leap to a vivid showing of hate. And Arkeld had not turned this imagery of hers into a concrete thing.

He had made the astounding offer of his friendship.

It was eight years since she had seen Arkeld.

When the Listons had arrived in town a few weeks ago Arkeld had called, but found them out, an experience reversed on their return call.

Then followed this invitation to dinner. Could one refuse an olive branch? Eight years was a long time.

The talk was trivial, flippant. Stella laughed at her own voicing of inanities.

She was glad when she could escape to the room of dim gray and leave the men to their cigars.

She felt that this room voiced something, was full of suggestions.

She thought of this room as an outward showing of the mind of Arkeld.

She wondered what part of him found expression in the flame of the flowers. Anger, hatred, a desire to punish—

On the chimney piece stood the little Chinese gods.

Stella moved over to them, staring at them. The grotesque faces returned her gaze.

Suddenly she knew fear, was gripped by it. This was Arkeld's room, and he was surely an enemy. His offer of friendship could only be a mockery.

She must be alert, watchful!

Her love for Liston would sharpen her eyes, her ears, her intuitions.

Godfrey was alone now with Arkeld.

These thoughts drove her to the door, set her fingers on the handle.

The men's voices silenced her. They were leaving the dining room and coming to her.

"I have been studying the flowers. They say things. You meant them to do so," she said.

Liston's voice came from the chimney piece. He was examining the Chinese gods.

"Jolly, unpleasant looking fellows," he commented.

He laughed as he studied the grotesque and leering face.

"Looks as if he wanted to do some one an ill turn, play the deuce with some one's peace of mind."

Arkeld laughed. He moved near to Liston.

He took the other model from the chimney piece and held it in his hand.

"That has a history," he said, fingering it.

"An unpleasant one, I should say," Liston commented.

"Well, rather. Shall I bore you?" He turned to Stella.

She shook her head.

"These were given me by a Chinese," Arkeld said, "because in a little matter I had served him. The trifles pleased me. They breathe romance. This"—he indicated the one he held—"contained at one time a very subtle poison. Orientals are clever at crafty whisperings to death.

"This was given by a lover to the woman who had betrayed him." Arkeld's fingers found and touched a spring. "The head comes off, so, and reveals a cavity. In the old days it was filled with a deadly liquid, a subtle thing which rose in fumes and wafted the inhaler into oblivion and death."

Arkeld closed the thing with a snap and replaced it on the chimneypiece.

"By jove!" said Liston. He still held the other model in his hand. Automatically his fingers moved, seeking for the spring.

"Godfrey!" Stella spoke quickly. Tempest cried in her voice. "Do not"—Her eyes met Arkeld's. She fell silent.

The only sound in the room was made when Liston replaced the laughing god on the chimney piece.

"Music—shall we?" Arkeld asked abruptly.

"You will play?"

Her fingers touched the keys as though they shrank from sound. They refused to follow the bidding of her will.

"I can't play tonight," she said.

She turned her head and saw Arkeld fingering one of the models, which he had lifted from the chimney piece.

She kept her head so, sitting stiffly, intent and watchful.

Arkeld's hand moved over the head of this little god of his. Suddenly he held it toward Liston.

"I should like you to have this. Keep it in memory of tonight."

"Thanks," Liston said.

Stella's elbow jerked involuntarily and touched the keys of the piano. The sound was sudden, leaping into the room with sinister meaning.

She wanted to speak, but words eluded her. She felt that she was groping in a dark place.

She got quickly to her feet.

"We must go," she said.

Stella made no excuse for suggesting an abrupt departure.

"We must go," she said again.

Her manner silenced Liston, who inclined to apologies, not realizing the subtle evasions of the hour.

Apologies still rose abortively to his lips when he and Stella were sitting in their motorcar, while Arkeld stood bareheaded at the door.

Stella, leaning back against the cushions, saw Arkeld's face with the light of a lamp full on it. Surely his face expressed triumph.

She felt that she saw in his eyes all that had been suggested, hinted at, in the room she had just left.

The jerk the car gave in starting was akin to the jerk of her thoughts when her eyes moved from Arkeld's face to the Chinese god which her husband held in his hand.

"Put it down," she said. "Do not hold it."

Liston's mood was one of mockery.

He spoke of nerves, jestingly.

Their hands met, struggling over the little grinning god. To him the skirmish was frivolity; to her a warfare of moment. Her fingers moved quickly; his slowly, teasingly.

He touched the spring, looking with laughing eyes into the opening.

"Something harmless," he said. "A letter"—

Her fingers were before his, seizing this paper. He still watched her with laughing eyes.

"Arkeld's writing?"

"No—not Arkeld's!"

Her voice silenced the laughter that was in him. Not knowing what it was she read, he yet had a desire to switch off the electric light.

All the time she read.

"Let me share the joke," Liston said.

She still read. There was contempt in her ignoring of his voice. Her silence stung him. He felt whipped. The car jerked again, and her hands, moving involuntarily, showed him his own handwriting.

He saw a vivid sentence, something familiar looking up at him from the paper. It was a sentence he had written to—the other woman!

His hand went to the button, and the inside of the car became darkness. Silence and darkness wrapped these two about. The darkness was like something palpable, a suggested presence of evil.

The car stopped at the entrance to their hotel.

Liston and his wife moved automatically, puppets moving at the bidding of Arkeld.

The entrance hall, the stairs, their own room when they reached it, were not so near to Stella as the room of dim gray with the massed, outrageous blooms.

She was still there, was wrapped about by its veiled suggestions of the thoughts of Arkeld.

She faced Liston, stared at him.

His eyes, not meeting hers, fell upon the crumpled letter in her hand.

She opened her fingers, and the letter drifted to the floor. She pushed it toward him with her foot. There was another woman!

She seemed to hear the laughter of Arkeld. Surely he had laughed when he fingered the little god.

This revenge was of greater subtlety than the poisoned fumes of which he spoke. Poison could but kill the body; this letter seared the soul of her.

"LET'S STILL HIS LAUGHTER," HE SAID.

Liston stooped, touching the paper as though he feared it. The date stared him in the face.

She read his thoughts.

"So recently"— Her words tripped, vague things.

Realizing, with a stab of something that was like physical pain, the mockery of her marriage, she ended with a sentence that was not vague.

"Then you married me merely for my money, fooling me with honeyed words?"

Suddenly she realised the subtlety of this vengeance of Arkeld's. He had hung a weight about her neck which she could not cast off. He knew her. Loveless she would starve.

Liston spoke volubly, seeking evasion.

He bit in two a sentence which cursed Arkeld for finding out this thing.

As for the letter, he sought to cloak its damning contents by contempt for Arkeld's probable methods of obtaining it.

"She is poor," Stella reminded him. She pointed to the letter. "You bemoan her poverty even while you cast her off."

Her voice stung her again.

"Such a woman would be glad of revenge—and money," she said.

Her mind held the picture of Arkeld paying with eager fingers a sum of money for this instrument of vengeance.

She spoke again, repeating herself:

"You fooled me with honeyed words!" The intolerable thought was that Arkeld knew this. He had seen her gather dross, thinking it gold. The knowledge was his revenge.

She had loved Liston, thinking him unaffected, certainly not subtle—a very honest man. That which she had loved had never had an existence save as a creature of her mind.

Liston threw the letter into the fire. They watched it burn. Flames leaped, tongues voicing sorry things.

That part of Liston which was least ignoble watched this burning with shamed eyes.

The part of him which was least ignoble crept to his lips, saying:

"Forgive me?"

She looked at him.

Her eyes seemed to entreat this part of him which was not base to triumph, to burn up other things. The thought came to her that this triumph would lessen the power of Arkeld's revenge.

Arkeld had conceived a very subtle form of vengeance. But subtlety was a thing which might be of small account in the presence of a great naturalness.

Liston said again:

"Forgive me. If not yet—then some day"—

Liston came toward her.

His fingers touched the hand that hung limply at her side. He pointed to the laughing god.

"Let's still his laughter," he said.

She felt her lips stiffen, refusing to move easily. She forced herself to voice forgiveness. Forgiveness was a thing which would strike that jeering god upon the mouth and silence—Arkeld!

Yes, it was the way out!

Liston's fingers still touched her hand.

"There's a chance for us since you forgive," he said.

TASTY PICKLES

MUSTARD PICKLES.—One quart of onions (small), one quart of cucumbers, one quart green tomatoes, one cauliflower picked in pieces, three green peppers. Stand overnight in weak salt water, set on fire and let heat through in morning and drain. Be sure to not let them boil.

Mustard.—Six tablespoonfuls of mustard, one-half cupful of flour, one and one-half cupfuls of sugar (and turmeric if liked), two or more cupfuls of vinegar. Place pickles in jars and pour the dressing boiling hot over them, filling jars brim full; then seal. When cooking the dressing, if it seems too thick add more vinegar.

Chow Chow.—One peck green tomatoes, one bunch of celery, six onions, two green peppers, two pounds of brown sugar, one tablespoonful allspice, cloves, cinnamon, pepper and salt, vinegar to cover (two or three quarts). Slice tomatoes, sprinkle with salt and let stand twenty-four hours. Drain off and rinse in cold water. Chop tomatoes, celery, onions and peppers, put in sugar and spices and cook two hours slowly.

Mixed Pickles.—Six green peppers and two red ones, one pint of small onions, one pint lima beans, one quarter peck string beans, one pint of celery, one pint of cauliflower, one pint of tiny cucumbers. Boil half gallon of cider vinegar, to which has been added a quarter of a pound of white sugar, a little turmeric and a little celery seed. Boil all together for about twenty minutes; or until it is thick.

Variety Pickles.—One gallon of cabbage chopped very fine, half gallon green tomatoes, one quart onions, all chopped fine; four tablespoonfuls of mustard, two tablespoonfuls ginger, one tablespoonful of cloves, one tablespoonful turmeric, one ounce of celery seed, two pounds of sugar, a little salt and a half gallon of good cider vinegar. Mix well and boil for thirty minutes.

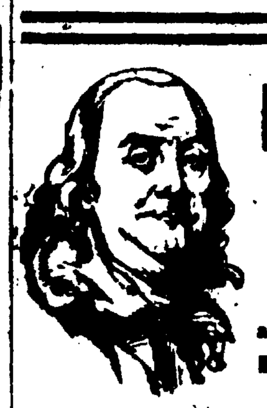
Economy Hints



A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

DRESS aprons are useful additions to the wardrobe of the woman who does her own housework. These are seen at their best when colored linens are used. The tans, green, blue, old red and brown look well with a narrow band of contrasting color or tiny piping of plain white linen bordering neck and armholes.

The same careful woman protects her hair from dust while busy about the home by wearing a dainty cap made of white mull and lace over a wire frame. This frame is turban shape and is economical inasmuch as the wire frame protects the coiffure from disarrangement.

For the housewife who thinks in advance this is the time to purchase really excellent half silk hose at the surprisingly low figure of 35 cents a pair. An inventive young woman recently purchased a dozen pairs of these hose, which were plain. She then embroidered on them small delicate designs of polka dots, tiny rosebuds and even a pattern of tiny clover blossoms done in French knot with silk of the same shade as the stockings.

If gloves or shoes of any color but black have become spotted by water and are allowed to dry there is no hope for them. They are irreparably ruined. But if, while they are still damp, they are kept on hands or feet and rubbed with a damp cloth the spots will disappear. Then brush briskly with a dry soft woolen cloth.

A young business woman manages a dainty conception in collars and cuffs over her blue serge office frock by a novel use of narrow hemstitched or embroidered edge handkerchiefs. Two handkerchiefs make a set. One is folded cornerwise and cut in half. These pieces, with the cut edge hemmed, are the cuffs. The second handkerchief is also cut in half and one half hollowed out to fit the neck. The remaining half is again cut in two parts and folded over the bodice in the form of revers. These sets are inexpensive and give an attractive touch to the office dress.

FOR THE BEDROOM.

How to Make the Stranger Within Your Household Comfortable.

The first consideration for a guest is comfort. She may be delighted with the vase of flowers that greets her from a table, but she will be sure to appreciate a pretty negligee hanging in the closet. Luggage seldom arrives at its destination with the traveler, and a negligee to slip into is often a comfort indeed. Feet are apt to be tired, and until slippers arrive the feet would be glad to rest in a pair of simple bedroom slippers. These are really no trouble at all to make. You just take a pair of lamb's wool soles and a strip of ribbon long enough to go around the sole and four inches wide. One edge is sewed to the edge of the sole, and the other is turned down to make a hem through which is run a narrow elastic. This draws the ribbon up, shaping it into a shoe.

Supposing you choose blue ribbon and work a few rosebuds on the toes in embroidery silk and make a simple kimono of pale blue cotton crape trimmed with a frill of white lace and finished with a loose belt of pink ribbon. This would be a dainty outfit and cost but little. Four yards of crape at 15 cents a yard, plain or flowered in blue, with two yards of lace at 10 cents a yard and two yards of ribbon at 12½ cents a yard, will be ample. In fact, if one looked around for bargains $1 would probably cover the entire cost.

Curtains can be made before they are needed, and dainty inexpensive materials can be had in the early spring. The printed lawns in the dress goods section make the prettiest curtains. The scrim and curtain muslins are not desirable. White cotton voile can be used for the sash curtains edged with lace. The colored curtains should be made with a valance, and if made as follows material may be saved: Cut two lengths, each measuring two and one-half yards, and hem one end. Cut a strip the entire width of the goods and twelve inches wide. Hem one raw edge and sew the selvage edges to the top of the two curtains (coming between them) and making one long straight edge. Hem this and pass the rod through, then hang.

The bedspread edged with a frill might be of the same material as the curtains, and slips for cushions could be simple white material over a color or decorated in a color.

How to Use Old Felt Hats.

Instead of throwing away your old or light colored felt hats let them soak overnight in good soapsuds, then wash thoroughly and let dry. You cannot buy finer material for making soft shoes for the baby not yet walking. They are soft, comfortable and can easily be kept clean. When soiled they can be washed on the washboard and molded into shape, letting them stand until dry. The cost is only a little silk thread for trimming.

SMART LINES FOR NEW TAILOR-MADES.

Tailored suit in Italian brown broadcloth, trimmed with buttons.

In studying the newest fashions designed for Fall wear one is impressed by the continued suppression of hip curves as against the defining of the waist-line and the emphasizing of the shoulder and bust curves. A very refined type of tailored frock is shown here, carried out in Italian brown broadcloth. The front of the jacket is fashioned in panel style, while to the sides and back is attached a two-piece circular section. In average size the costume calls for 4½ yards 54-inch material.

A glance at the cutting guide will show what careful maneuvering is necessary to use the material to the best advantage. Today's lesson deals exclusively with the cutting of the coat, for the model is well adapted to separate wear and may be carried out in any material. The circular skirt section of the coat comes first and is laid on a lengthwise thread of the material, the straight edge running along the selvage edge of the cloth. Along the lengthwise fold is laid the back, and next the underfacing, followed by collar, cuff and belt. Between the front and the upper sleeve section which are placed near the selvage of the goods and the sections of the pattern laid along the lengthwise fold, the trimming piece, undersleeve and pocket are laid. In this way there is practically no waste, and the small pieces of material that are left can be used to cover the buttons.

In connection with the new tailored costumes there are shown charming blouses, and sometimes the waist repeats the color of the gown, if not the tone.

Pleated skirts are the favorite models to wear with the jackets of long line and are liked because they express dignity and reserve.

Buttons as a trimming are to be used extensively. They will serve no purpose but that of ornamentation pure and simple, even most of the fastenings of frocks being really closed with snaps and the buttons serving to hide the snap stitches.

Ofttimes the towels become gray and dingy looking. Treat them in this manner and they will become white again:

Place them in a kettle and cover with cold water. Add shavings of pure white soap and the juice of a lemon. Place on the back of the stove and allow the water to gradually come to a boil. If very much soiled the process may have to be repeated, says the New York Times. Rinse in tepid water, then in a slightly blue water and hang in the air to dry.

GILBERT AS A WIZARD.

Curious Tricks of an Old Time Investigator of Electricity.

H. G. Wells has called attention in "The World Set Free" to a half forgotten worthy who, in "the spacious times of great Elizabeth," loomed large indeed. Science, to be sure, does not forget him, and one great English poet, Dryden, has proclaimed with resonant emphasis:

Gilbert shall live until loadstones cease to draw.

Nevertheless how many young students of electricity today ever heard of William Gilbert?

"It was Gilbert, Queen Elizabeth's court physician, who first puzzled his brains with rubbed amber and bits of glass and silk and shellac," says Mr. Wells, "and so began the quickening of the human mind to the existence of this universal presence. And even then the science of electricity remained a mere little group of curious facts for 200 years, connected perhaps with magnetism—a mere guess that—perhaps with the lightning. * * * Except for the lightning conductor, it was 250 years before electricity stepped out of the cabinet of scientific curiosities into the life of the common man."

Gilbert's theories and guesses about magnetism—he concluded that the world is a vast spherical magnet—were serious and farreaching, and he embodied them in a book with a ponderous Latin title—the first great book on physics published in England. But his experiments were chiefly of the curio and plaything sort. An English collection of Elizabethan letters and anecdotes of court life quotes the opinion of a provincial young lady of quality, but recently come up to London to accept a position in the queen's household, who had witnessed some of them. She wrote home to her mother:

"The queen is now well recovered of her sicknesse, which was but litle, tho it lookt at first as it wold be greate. She pats much truste in her Doctor, one Gilbert, and soe doe her ladis for the moste parte, and I am laught at by alle but onely Lady Margaret for that I doe fear the man and his cures that they bee not such as are permited to Xtian (Christian) folke to undergoe. I have seen him playe strange tricks, takeing, for the diversion of the queen's ladis, a silke glove from one and her bedes of ambre from another and a scrappe of the writeing of her Love from another, if she have it about her and can be purswaded to give it uppe, and makeing the one to rattle and give forthe sparkles of fyre, and the others one to pick the other uppe by touching of it—and a blacke catte comeing in he rubed her that she brisled and gave forthe little fyres that daunced alonge her furre in the dark as if the wyches that love blacke cattes were strokeing her back. Soche matters are of the divel and sholde not be medled with for sporte. they are not meet for good Xtians."

Poor, timid little lady! If she deemed Dr. Gilbert's tricks and cures of 300 years ago so perilous to the soul what would she have thought of the electric shocks, baths, massage and all the varied tingling, prickling, crackling and spark spitting electrical devices of our modern physicians?

Before the Toothbrush.

Before the invention of toothbrushes people used to clean their teeth with linen. This is evident from William Vaughan's "Fifteen Directions to Preserve Health," published 1602, in which the author tells those who want to keep the teeth "white and uncorrupt" that they must wash the mouth after every meal, "sleepe with the mouth somewhat open * * * and in the morning take a linnen-cloth and rub the teeth well within and without." In Vaughan's time several varieties of tooth powder were known, the recipe for one of the simplest being as follows: "Burne a piece of Corke till it looks like a Coale, then take it out of the Fyre and it will fall to ashes, wherewith rub your teeth."—London Chronicle.

Fresh Figs.

The first known tree referred to in the Bible is the fig tree. We are apt to think of figs as very sweet dried fruit, brown in color, packed into long wooden boxes. When newly gathered figs are rather like pears in shape and of a green or purple color. Eaten in this state, the people of the east consider them the most delicious of fruit, but the figs are also dried, and in that form are included in almost every meal.

The Modern Way.

Mrs. Henry Peck—Men have degenerated sadly since the days of chivalry. Sir Walter Raleigh spread his cloak on the ground for the queen to walk on. Women do not walk on men's cloaks in these modern days. Mr. Henry Peck—No; they walk on men's necks now.—Puck.

Open to Conviction.

"I understand," said Mr. Dolan, "that you declared there should be no more fightin'."

"I said that," replied Mr. Rafferty. "But I never was obstinate, an' mebbe a few words of argument from you can make me change my mind."—Washington Star.

A Dilemma.

Wife—Henry, you really must have the landlord come and see for himself the awful damage the rain did to our ceiling. Hub—I can't without letting him see the damage the children have done to the rest of the house.—Boston Transcript.

Beautiful Ex-Queen of Portugal Does War Work as Trained Nurse.

AMELIE, PORTUGAL'S EX-QUEEN.

Concealing her identity in cap and stripe for several weeks, Portugal's ex-queen has been working as a trained nurse in the Third London general hospital at Wandsworth, England.

Entering the hospital as a probationer and insisting that her identity be kept secret, her majesty has been working eight hours a day, performing all the heavy work assigned to other nurses. Every morning she motors to the hospital from Richmond.

For weeks her patients, not recognizing the ex-queen, addressed her as plain "ma'am." Only the sister in charge of her ward knew the secret till recently.

USES FOR OLD LINEN.

How Frenchwomen Use the Tops of Old Evening Gloves.

Never throw away old linen in any shape or form. Cotton sheets and pillowcases when old and worn are soft and splendid for bandages and other sickroom needs. No new bandage ever equals old bed or table linen for such purposes, as they will tell you at any hospital, but it is understood it must be sterilized before being used.

Housekeepers are apt to overlook this use for old linen unless there is really sickness present in the house, but a store of such pieces laid away will never come amiss even if they are only used for ironing boards and for wrapping up bundles in the storeroom, for in a contagious disease old sheets must be hung over the doorways to the sickroom and kept wet with disinfectant. When the weather is hot wet sheets hung about the room will cool the air.

The linen should have been washed clean without starch, and the hands that roll it should be very clean. For an open wound sterilized gauze will be a necessity, but clean linen may be used to protect the bandages underneath. At the hospitals the old linen so utilized is baked in the regular ovens to sterilize it before using.

When the bandages are rolled they should be placed in a clean covered receptacle until needed. A glass jar or a covered box will do for the purpose. The width of the bandages depends upon their use. About one inch is wide enough for a finger, and from that the widths vary. For an abdominal bandage six or eight inches may not be too wide.

The tops of old evening gloves have their use too. An appeal recently came from Paris for them, to be sewed together as interlinings in vests for soldiers in winter trenches. Hundreds of poor women are kept employed making these winter comforts.

Nurseries.

In the scheme of living where appearances must be maintained at all costs, where the keeping of servants is regarded as an absolute essential, where the whole aim is to impress one's acquaintances, children are too often regarded as needless luxuries. Where they are permitted to intrude, they come, as a usual thing, in single numbers, one child being considered enough of a burden. In Europe the women who have followed this theory have in many cases seen their entire family swept away and the sad condition has made the mothers of America pause and reflect.

When one comes to think of it, how very few houses are built with nurseries. Even large homes, rented at exorbitant rates, seldom have a nursery. One of the bedrooms has to be given over to the kiddies, but it can never be made to look quite as useful and pretty as if it had been designed for the purpose. The ideal nursery ought to be tiled all round halfway up the wall, not cold green tiles, but a warm shade of tan or a deep pink. The room ought to have fitted cupboards in it, so that not an inch of space is wasted. There should be fitted guards in front of the windows, so that there is no danger of the babies falling out, and the fireplace ought to be large and open, not the absurd little affairs that one finds in the bedrooms of the ordinary modern house.

ITALIAN SUBMARINE UNDER WATER FOR SEVENTY HOURS

Given Up as Lost, the Nereide Returns Safely to Its Base.

Praise is being showered upon the crew of the Italian submarine Nereide, who through an accident were compelled to remain beneath the surface for seventy hours without food or light and their supply of oxygen almost exhausted before the engines were repaired and the vessel was able to reach her base in safety, greatly to the surprise of naval officials, who believed the craft was lost. Even the ministry of marine accepted the report from Vienna to the effect that the Nereide, one of Italy's newer submarines, had been destroyed by an Austrian war vessel.

Hour after hour in the stifling, brain bursting interior of the submarine, without sleep, without rest, they worked. Then the thickening fumes took their toll of the commander, and a subordinate directed the work. The men lost trace of time. Once they obtained a few revolutions of the screw, and a faint, husky cheer used up more of the precious oxygen. But their exhilaration was brief, for the motors stopped again, and the work had to be done all over.

Two more men collapsed and were barely kept alive when the chief engineer, exploring with blind fingers, found the seat of trouble and at length repaired it. The motors started once more. Slowly the shell began to rise from the bottom. The periscope reached the surface and found a clear sea. Out from the water came the hull, and the hatch of the conning tower was opened for the first breath of fresh air in three long days. But it was too late for the three men in collapse below. They died without regaining consciousness. Two more men died on the way to port.

The Rubber Plant in 1735.

The first accurate information regarding the wonderful rubber plant was furnished by La Condamine, a French scientist who was sent in 1735 by the government of France to measure an arc of the meridian near Quito. This brought him to the heart of the rubber growing country, and much valuable information was thus obtained.

DISPOSSESSION CASE COMPROMISED IN COURT

Several months ago Mrs. Edith Mooney of this city purchased a house and plot of ground at 925 Emory st. from George Ives, and the initial payment was $50. Mrs. Mooney entered into an agreement with John Otis by which she offered to turn over to him her contract with Mr. Ives if he would pay her $50 in installments of $10 each and complete repairs amounting to $50 on the premises.

On August 10 a payment was due, and when Mr. Otis did not pay $10 Mrs. Mooney brought an action to dispossess him. Judge Wilson granted a final order of dispossess to Mrs. Mooney on August 31, when Mr. Otis did not appear in court. Mr. Otis, through his attorney, Hubert L. Gilman, appealed for a stay and pending settelment, Mrs. Mooney was ordered to appear in court today to show cause why the order should not be vacated, as Mr. Otis claimed he was not a tenant.

The case was finally compromised when Mr. Otis paid Mrs. Mooney's fare from Rome and return and the costs of the action, $1.20, and he will be allowed to occupy the premises. James R. Somers appeared for Mrs. Mooney.

BOWENS CORNERS ROAD GETS FINISHING TOUCHES

B. A. Reddington, of Syracuse, formerly Barge Canal Engineer here, but now in charge of road work for the State Highway Department, who is supervising the construction of the Bowens Corners road southwest of the city, announced today that the road was rapidly nearing completion. Only 200 yards of the road still remain to be covered and it is likely taht the thoroughfare will be open some time next week. De Barbour and Hill, of this city, are the contractors in charge.

The portions of the road already completed have been pronounced by experts to be unusually well constructed and good examples of what modern road building really means. The road is wide, with his shoulders and a three-and-one-half inch stone surface. The road, which is one of the main thoroughfares of travel leading out of the city, has been closed to traffic for several weeks.

Germans Capture Fortress Guarding Grodno; Advance Toward Petrograd Road

London, Sept. 4.—Grondo, the last of the great fortresses in Russian Poland, fell into the hands of Field Marshal von Hindenburg's army yesterday—the twelfth stronghold to be taken by the Teutonic invaders within a little less than a month, or since the fall of Warsaw on August 5.

Not a word is said in the official German report which announces the fall of thef ortress regarding the fate of the garrison. It may be safely inferred from this that there was no garrison, but instead only an insignificant force of Russians left behind for rear-guard actions.

Thus, paradoxical as it may sound, the capture of the last powerful stronghold in Russian Poland is attended—at present at least—by a victory for the Grand Duke Nicholas, while for the Teutons it means the taking of an empty fortress battered to pieces by their own heavy guns, besides the burden of feeding the population of the occupied area.

Russians Elude Trap

A week ago the Germans took Olita, due north of Grondo. This enabled them to sweep in a southwesterly direction and cut the Grodno-Vilna railroad with the view to trapping the forces that had retreated from Bielostok upon Grodno, and the garrison of the fortress. They did cut the railroad, but the Russian forces had meanwhile slipped out of their reach. With his main forces and the greater part of the garrisons of twelve fortresses the Grand Duke Nicholas is still retreating, safely and in order, out of the Bielowieska forest and the marshes that extend form any miles eastward from Brest-Litovsk.

Thus, the aim of the Germans to crush the Russian main army is still unfulfilled. The decisive battle is yet to be fought.

Nevertheless, the taking of Grodno is not to be underestimated in that it opens a free road to the Germans for Wilna, north of the captured fortress and connected with it by an excellent railway. That this big Russian town is the next goal of a part of the German armies has long been apparent and is again manifested by the statement in the official report that "German cavalry advanced to the northwest and west of Vilna."

Teuton Gains in Galicia

Meanwhile, the last chapter of the Galician drama is being written by the steady progress of the Austro-German armies which yesterday took Brody, only three miles from the frontier, in their efforts to drive the Russians out of the small strip of Galician territory they still hold.

The German statement today said:

Field Marshall von Hindenburg's army conquered Grodno, after rapidly forcing a passage of the Nieman and fighting the Russians in the streets of the city. The Germans reached the Niemen between the Augustowo Canal and the Swislocz-Lennew-Arden line.

German cavalry advanced to the northwest and west of Vilna. The Russians attempted to oppose our advance, but failed, suffering extraordinarily large losses. Southeast of Merecez the Russians were thrown back. Gen. von Gallwitz's troops broke the resistance of the enemy on the Alek-Szyce-Swislocz road. Field Marshal von Hindenburg's army captured more than 3,000 Russians, as well as one cannon and eighteen machine guns.

The army of Prince Leopold of Bavaria is still engaged in battle north of Pruszany.

The army of Field Marshall von Mackensen, pursuing the Russians, reached the Jasoida river, near Silnek and Bereza, and also in the district of Antopol, east of Kobrin. Austro-Hungarian troops are advancing to the east and south of Boloto and Dubowoje.

Southeastern theatre of war—Gen. Bothmer's army is advancing and is fighting in the Sereth district.

Prepare Another Attack

The official statement issued by the Austrian War office today significantly reports, besides progress of the driving movement toward and over the Galician frontier, that the Russian forces already pushed beyond the border line are "lined up over the whole front" north of Zalozce, east of Brody as well as in the region west of the Dubno and within the radius of the Volynian fortress triangle, meaning the triangle formed by Dubon, Luzk and Rodno. There, the statement says, the Austro-German armies are "preparing to attack."

This gives rise to speculation as to whether the Russians will again try to turn and make a stand. While military critics hold out little hope for the success of such a move it would be certain to result in much delay and probably heavy losses to the Teutons. The question of such a decision on the part of the Russian commander in that region hinges largely upon the extent of his ammunition and communications.

Riga, the Russian Baltic port, continues to be the objective of the Teuton armies in Courland, and eventually, no doubt, of the German Baltic fleet. Progress in the land movement was reported by Berlin yesterday in the capture of a "further consequential point," northwest of Friedrichstadt, which is about forty miles from Riga.

With the steady progress of the Austro-German armies speculation increases in military circles as to whether Petrograd, Kieff or Odessa, or all three, will be the next objective.

AVIATOR LIVES TO DESCRIBE FALL

Tells of Drop to Ground Amid Fire of Fierce Conflict.

MACHINE SMASHED BY SHOT

Few Ever Survive to Give Account of Such a Thrilling Experience—Lost Consciousness as His Aeroplane Dropped Through Clouds to a Battlefield Thousands of Feet Below.

Paris.—The following account constitutes a record of an experience out of which few come alive. It is the story told by an air man of his fall and his instinct with the terror of the air.

"Scarcely had I burst through the curtain of clouds," the aviator writes, "when I saw long tongues of flame and the lightning of explosions, while the air was full of little puffs of shrapnel. I was over a battlefield. Without thinking, in automatic fashion making the necessary maneuvers, I attempted to turn about. But immediately I saw a large enemy's biplane making straight for me. It was just as I had finished my visage and lost sight of the enemy that the irreparable happened. There was a terrific crash. The machine was hit by a shell.

"It tilted forward, pushed me from behind, and the left wing was shedding its remains to the winds. My levers slackened, the machine rocked, and in spite of my efforts with the elevator and rudder pitched forward and began to fall. The earth rose up to meet me with terrific speed, and instantly the thought of the fire after the fall took me by the throat. Anything but that! With inconceivable rapidity I cut the ignition, and leaving my levers I struggled to undo my straps. I had no time, though, as we were down already. First the screw went into a hundred splinters, and an indescribable confusion of noises and movements assailed me.

"My straps cut me cruelly, then burst, and I fell crouched amid the wreck, still with the illusion of a mad race through space. In despite of all I made desperate efforts to free myself from the tangle of cords and wires. Then I heard a voice shouting, 'Lie down, in the name of God—they are firing at you!' It was only then, to my intense astonishment, that I grasped the fact that the battle was filling the air with its tumult and that the earth was trembling with reverberation.

"Mechanically I tried to raise myself on an elbow, but at that instant on the stone that protected my head came the smack of a bullet, which went ricocheting on in the midst of a shower of sparks. My giddiness increased, and I felt that I was gradually losing consciousness; then coma. I do not know how long it lasted, but gradually consciousness came back, and the tumult of the battle seemed to fade away in the distance. A confused sound of voices reached me, and I felt that I was being dragged along by the feet. Suddenly I fell into a hole. Four or five soldiers were standing round me, looking with pity at me. A great stupor was over me and prevented me from moving or speaking.

"The voices of the men seemed to come to me from afar, but I could easily make out their sense and even notice the queer phraseology of some of the remarks, such as, 'He is well touched up,' 'He is not altogether done for, but his face is a jelly,' and so on. Then a commanding tone from some invisible person asked, 'Have you caught the air man?' 'Yes, lieutenant,' answered one, and in reply to a query as to how I was, 'We cannot see; his head is all bloody, and he does not move, but one would say that he looks at us.' 'Take him to the hiding hole.'

"The men replied that it was not possible because the enemy was pouring a curtain of fire with noxious gases so that not a field mouse could pass. To the captain's hut, then, and I was taken very carefully up and carried along the passage trench, while overhead the noise of tearing metal and roaring shells was unceasing. Suddenly my bearers threw me against the side and slipped into the corners just as a tremendous report burst over our heads, followed by a shower of sliding earth and stones. The force of the shock seemed to banish my torpor and set me on my feet, to the intense astonishment of my bearers, who then led me the rest of the way till I was in the presence of the captain, a grizzled fellow, smoking a pipe, leaning against the sand bags, with his kepi tied with a handkerchief under his chin—a peaceful and jovial looking figure.

"He was extraordinarily calm and held out his hand with a kind smile and the remark, 'You had a devil of a tumble; I thought you were done for.' Just at this moment a great German biplane in distress came sliding toward us in an oblique fall. The captain immediately gave the order to fire, and from all sides rang out a fusillade from invisible soldiers. The machine came to ground like a thunderbolt, passing a few yards above our heads. There were three men on board, two of whom were dead, lying over the edge, and the pilot was stolidly maneuvering in desperation to fall within his own lines."

THE PAVING QUESTION

By Buster

The question of paving—
Now floats in the air;
It causes bad language
And loss of good hair.

The width of the street
Does not matter so much;
But anger, you greet
If our shade trees you touch.

Our prominent men,
They cannot agree
They scrap like the d—l
At each meeting you see.

The white dove of peace
Has taken her flight;
From the City of Fulton
She's flown out of sight.

Soon snow flakes will fall
And winter winds sing;
Alas! for our pavement,
Has that taken wing?

FIGHT FANS YELL FOR ACTION; BOUT RESULTED IN DRAW

Was for Championship of Both Sides of Great Divide---Local Fans to Have Real Treat, Friday, Sept. 17, When Kid Commission Puts One Over On the Administration Club.

Written for The Evening Times by Mr. The. Nuz.

The Announcer:

"De foist bott, loides and gemmen, for the champeenship of Foist st. east and west, will bring together the two sterling heavyweights, Steve Johnson, the pride of the woolen mills, and A. Marmaduke Frederic Page, late ambassador to Honkgong, and holder of the silk-stocking belt. Both boys are members of this club."

The Crowd: "Aw—sit down!" "Come on, Steve, make him insensible!" "Atta boy!" "Now, Frederic, finish this with dispatch!"

Steve: (to his seconds). "Watch me, George. I got his number, right!"

Freddie: (to his rubbers.) "I give you fair warning, friends, I am about to annihilate him."

FIRST ROUND.

Both men advance to the center of the ring. Thep spar cautiously for a few minutes. Steve lands his favorite punch, a public spirit to the jaw. Fred shakes his head and wades in. Both exchange petitions to the body. Fred has the better of the argument.

SECOND ROUND.

At the sound of the bell Steve rushes from his corner. Fred is a few minutes late, and catches a hard resolution to the eye. He clinches and demands a foul, which the referee does not allow. Steve lands a street railway swing and Fred comes back with a pervaricator uppercut. Honors about even.

THIRD ROUND.

Both boys tired, meet in the middle of the ring. They clinch and Fred lands a personal reflection wallop which has Steve groggy for a few minutes. He hangs on until he recovers and then rushes his adversary to the ropes. They exchange punches, with Fred landing a hard petition haymaker and Steve using the influence right hand with good effect. As the final bell rings, Fred's supporters are yelling, "Give him the injunction!"

The Referee: "The fight is a draw, but I wish to announce that both boys will meet again at this club next week."

The Crowd: "Awri! Bring on the next wictums!"

Steve: "Wait till I get him in the ring again!"

Fred: "I am slightly out of condition, gentlemen, but I assure you that I shall win easily at our next meeting."

The announcer: "Lodies and gemmen! I wish to introduce for the next bout, Fighting Frank of the Administration athletic club, and Versatile Wills, of the B. of P. W. association."

FIRST ROUND.

Wills looks over-weight and both men appear to be out of condition as they walk to the center of the ring. Frank leads with a resignation left which Wills ducks. Both men feint for a few minutes with the crowd yelling for action. Once more Frank tries the resignation punch and, although it looked like a miss from the ringside, Frank's supporters think it landed. Wills appears fresh at the bell.

ROUND TWO.

Frank gets instructions in his corner and at the bell is halfway across the ring. He lands a malfeasance swing to the jaw. The referee stops the fight to look for iron pipe in Frank's glove. When the men start to work again, Wills surprises Frank with a counter malfeasance wallop, known as the "Charities bill and horse-sale punch." Frank ducks and counters with the Albany one-two. Both men bleeding freely, and the crowd is yelling for more when the bell rings.

The Announcer: "Lodies and gemmen, keep your seats. I wish to announce that at this club on the night of September 17, there will be a fight to the finish betwen Champion Present Form, the pride of the Administration club, and Kid Commission, fresh from victories in Dayton, Des Moines and Buffalo. I thank you for your kind attention!"

"VIC" LEWIS GETS SOLID ENDORSEMENT OF G. O. P. CITY COMMITTEEMEN

As was predicted in The Times of last Saturday, Victor C. Lewis was selected to head the Republican city ticket at a meeting of the City Republican Committee held Saturday night. Mr. Lewis was the unanimous choice of the committee and is assured of the solid support of the organization.

Mr. Lewis is not the first of his family to enter the political limelight. His father, ex-Assemblyman Thomas D. Lewis, was for many years the dominating factor in Republican politics in Oswego county and is still influential in local political circles.

Victor C. Lewis is one of the younger business men of the city, is very popular and conducts a thriving retail tobacco business in Cayuga st. He has never before held political office, and expressed surprise when informed of his selection. When questioned Saturday morning regarding the possibility of his being named Mr. Lewis said he was not aware that he had been nominated. His friends are of the opinion that he will be elected by a large majority.

The action of the committee dispels all doubt concerning the Mayoralty candidate of the Republicans this fall, and practically eliminates Mayor Frank E. Fox from the race. Many citizens were of the opinion that the committee would indorse Mayor Fox for re-election, but it is understood that all the committeemen several weeks ago decided on Mr. Lewis.

Reports that he would run against Mr. Lewis in the primaries and that petitions were in circulation for him were vigorously denied by Mayor Fox in an interview this afternoon.

"I will not think of running again," said the Mayor. "If there are petitions in circulation for me it's news to me. No, I will never run against the choice of my party and I'm perfectly satisfied to step out. While I've been Mayor I can say that I've done the best I knew, and I'm willing to let some one else have a try at it."

"Would you head an independent ticket?" the reported asked.

"No, I will not run," said the Mayor.

Mayor Fox discussed the probability of electing Mr. Lewis and said he did not believe an independent ticket could be elected.

"I know that many people are dissatisfied with me," said the Mayor." Several incidents in which I acted as I considered it my duty to act, have cost me friends. There are many people here who want a wide-open city, liquor on Sunday, and everything else in that line. They don't seem to realize that laws are made to be obeyed and when I've tried to make them obey the laws some people have come to me and told me my actions are hurting the town.

"The same is true in this assessment increase. When I suggested an increase in the assessments in the downtown section the newspapers went after me. In my opinion, the business property is the only property unassessed.

"How about the manufacturing plants?" asked the reported.

"I think the manufacturers on the whole are assessed correctly," said the Mayor. "Of course, they can sell water power and get big money for it, but anything as unstable as that can't be assessed at its full value. With the business properties it's different. I've seen men in the downtown section raise the rents year after year, refuse to improve the buildings and let the tenant do all that; but when their ssessments are raised they call it an injustice."

HENRY MINOR PREFERS SUBURBAN SOLITUDE TO SIXTY-DAY SENTENCE

After Judge Wilson told Henry Minor in City Court this morning that he would make out a commitment under which Minor would spend 60 days in the county jail if he was ever seen on the streets of Fulton again, Minor decided that he preferred to take the 60 days right away. The Judge was perfectly willing to send Minor who is an old offender, but after some thonght Minor decided that liberty was sweet and asked the Judge to send him out of the city for 60 days and then allow him to come back for a consultation, at which time the Judge could decide whether or not to banish him permanently. The Judge agreed and Minor will leave the city today for the home of his son in the country. If he is found on the streets before 60 days have elapsed he will go to jail.

Minor was arrested on complaint of his wife, who has appeared against him on several occasions. She says he drinks to excess and makes their home life miserable. She stoutly maintained in court that she never said anything to offend him, whereat Minor turned to Chief Dyer and said, "Chief, did you ever know a woman who couldn't talk and couldn't nag a man?"

Mrs. Minor promised Judge Wilson that she wouldn't say a word to Henry while he was pacing his clothes, and Henry was allowed to go. He has been arraigned in the city court on some charge or other at least seven times since Judge Wilson has been on the bench, according to records, and each time he has escaped a jail sentence.

FIRST ST. PAVING PROSPECTS FADE, IS THE BELIEF

Postponement of the Project Means Harmonious Setting for Whatever Administration is in Power When Opportune Time Shall Have Arrived.

There were no new developments over Labor Day in the First st. paving fight, and at present it looks very much as though Commissioner Wiltsie and Special Commissioners Fred Gage and George Mason have "called the bluff." No meeting of the Board of Public Works has yet been anounced to Mayor Fox and President John W. Stevenson of the board, and no date has been set for the next meeting.

At noon today, Mayor Fox said Commissioner Wiltsie had not yet resigned and that he had heard nothing from the commissioner. The Mayor called upon Commissioner Wiltsie last week and asked him to resign in order that the board meetings might be more harmonious, and according to the Mayor, the commissioner said he would resign at once. Mr. Wiltsie vigorously contradicts this and says he will not resign until the paving matter has been settled. Mr. Gage and Mr. Mason were confident at noon today that the commissioner would not resign and Mr. Mason stated that Mr. Wiltsie had reached the limit of his patience and was ready to fight for his seat until the last ditch.

Mr. Wiltsie says the Mayor told him that Messrs. Stevenson and Garrett had tendered their resignations, to take effect unless Mr. Wiltsie resigned, and Mayor Fox admitted telling Mr. Wiltsie this, but as yet neither Mr. Stevenson nor Mr. Garrett have seen fit to carry out their intentions. The opposition element believes this a part of the so-called "bluff" engineered by those in favor of the wide street. They say Messrs. Stevenson and Garrett never had any intention of resigning.

Later in the week Mayor Fox made public charges against Mr. Wiltsie, involving the sale of building materials to a contractor in charge of city work, and hinted that Mr. Wiltsie's removal on these charges, but denies any wrong intent, and says he will fight any attempt to remove him, and will reveal certain other operations of which he has knowledge if the Mayor brings action against him.

After this last announcement of the commissioner, followed by a statement from the Mayor to the effect that he was willing that anything Mr. Wiltsie wished to disclose should be made public, no action has been taken by both sides.

Mr. Wiltie is so offended at the publicity given the matter that he refused to talk to a Times reporter this morning, after that individual had made known his identity.

George E. Mason is of the opinion that the administration has played its hand and lost for the present at least. Mr. Mason does not believe Mayor Fox will remove Mr. Wiltsie on the "picayune charge," as Mr. Mason termed it, and prophesied lively action should the Mayor attempt to oust the commissioner.

The general opinion seems to be that the board will abandon all work on the street now until after the next election, when the terms of the commissioners now holding office will expire. It is rumored that Mayor Fox's visit to Albany Friday was for the purpose of delaying the inauguration of paving work until the next Mayor can be elected. Then influence will be brought to bear to "pack" the Board of Public Works with three strong men, who are in favor of a wide street. With Messrs. Gage and Mason then in the minority the work will go on without interruption, except by injunction. Under this plan, however, the paving will not be finished and, perhaps, not even started, this year.

FOOTBALL PLAYERS GET TRYOUT THURSDAY

The Tigers, that redoubtable team of handlers of the pigskin sphere, are expected to appear in the East Side Park Thursday evening, and incidentally the young men who aspire to become a part of the organization during the fall of 1915, are also invited to partake of a tryout the same evening.

ASSESSORS SAT TODAY TO HEAR GRIEVANCES

Today is Grievance Day at City Hall and all morning the office of Harry M. O'Brien, which is occupied today by the Assessors, was crowded with taxpayers who wish their assessments reduced or mistakes rectified. One of the assessors said this morning that few reductions will be allowed this year.

Several business men who own property in the downtown section were on hand to appeal against the assessments on their property but few obtained any satisfaction. A list of the reductions may be filed this afternoon.

BROWN BILL TO BOB INTO THE LIMELIGHT

The Common Council will meet in regular monthly session tonight. Along with the routine business to be transacted, it is rumored that the provision in the Brown bill, giving the aldermen the right to vote and set a salary for the aldermen to be elected in November, will be acted upon, and the salaries set at tonight's meeting.

The Result Was Expected

Although the respectable press of Georgia, and of the South generally, has demanded the arrest and punishment of the murderers of Leo M. Frank, no intelligent person will be surprised at the announcement by the Grand Jury investigating the case that no evidence has been found which would warrant indictments. The lamentable truth is that the crime was committed under the leadership of well known people. Indeed, so confident were the lynchers of immunity that they posed before a camera without even a pretense of disguise. Self-respecting Georgians are smarting under criticism which they realize is deserved, but they are too cowardly to insist effectively upon the punishment of the lynchers.—Rochester Chronicle and Democrat.

At Last Sees the Dangers

Jewell Mayes, secretary of the State Board of Agriculture, is up in arms against oleomargarine, imitation butter— "for millions of dollars' worth of oleomargarine are sold annually as butter, thus robbing the American dairy industry," he says Correct! It is a pleasure to see Brother Mayes fighting so ardently for American industries. Wes hall expect to see him renounce the Democratic faith ere long and limber up his linotype against a Tariff policy that permits Free-Trade with Canada, whence comes millions of dollars' worth of real butter, eggs, farm products and live stock, thus robbing the American farmer. Let us rejoice that this Ray County editor has at last seen the dangers that confront American industries—even though imitation butter is the wedge that opened his eyes. —Kingston (Mo.) Mercury.

Too Much Gold

Do you remember that some years ago William J. Bryan and his supporters were going up and down the land loudly declaring that there was not enough gold in the world with which to do business and that there—fore free and unlimited coinage of silver was imperative necessary? But even Bryan is indulging in no such talk now.

The fact is that gold, in so far as this country is concerned is becoming something like a drug in the market. The precious metal has been pouring into the United States in such volume that it is a question what to do with the receipts. Leading bankers are puzzled over the situation, as is shown by the remark of one of them in New York the other day. He expressed the hope that the war indebtedness of foreign countries would not be adjusted by the shipment here of additional quantities of gold, continuing:

"At present when our banks are embarrassed by their immense holdings of surplus cash, the piling up of several hundred million dollars of additional gold would have a contrary effect to that for which bankers are striving. It would promote inflation, cause a rise in stock market prices to unreasonable lengths and result in a general increase in the cost of living, and other evils which it is unnecessary to enumerate."

Strange to say, these are precisely the results predicted by Bryan and his fellow silverites if the country adhered to the gold standard and refused to "monetize" silver. The gold standard was maintained and the outcome has been very satisfactory. And now gold is coming here in a steady stream, whilen obody thinks of suggesting the addition of "free silver" to our currency. On the contrary, there is so much gold that some eminent financiers believe it would be well to shut off the supply.—Troy Times.

SHORT WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

A large city daily calls attention to what it calls the influence of the public to being made the victims of dealers by means of short weights and measures. If a customer puts up with fifteen-ounce pounds, the dealer has an ounce of profit, in addition to his other profits. The short weight dealer makes a hit when he has a customer that pays no attention to weights and measures. Such a customer makes profits easier to get.

It is surprising to find so many men in business who give every detail connected with private business their every attention, yet when it comes to looking after the weights and measures in the affairs connected with the administration of municipalities they leave to the politician the task of getting what they pay for. The same class of men will complacently submit to being robbed by the unscrupulous dealers in patronage who give short weights and measures, simply because they will not take the trouble to find out how they are being cheated in that way.

But conditions are changing. The people in hundreds of American cities are sitting up nights to learn about securing what they pay for. The people are not taking for granted that dealers will not violate the laws and that it is unnecessary to look after the fences.

Commission-Manager form of government is the outgrowth of the influence of the people to being made the victims of all sorts of short weights and measures. Under the old form of government they have been made the purchasers of the fifteen-ouce pound and the recipients of the patronage get the ounce of profit. It is hard to estimate how many thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money would be saved each year if it were the general practice of the people to observe the figures on the set of scales which should check up what is purchased.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS
President American Society for Thrift

Thrift is not a will-'o-the-wisp that is with us today and away tomorrow. It is established by practice rather than theory, by example rather than precept, and it is the certain way to happiness. Robert Louis Stevenson said: "Happiness consists in earning a little and spending a little less." Here are some happy examples of personal thrift: There is an Illinois school boy, 14 years old, whose name is Arthur Kich. This summer he rented ten square yards of ground on which to plant radishes, tomatoes, beans and other garden truck. Then he borrowed $20 from his grandfather and made the first payment on a horse. He secured parts of a buggy for a small sum paying $1 for the wheels. The wagon box he made himself with another boy, whom he paid 50 cents for his work. Then he went to the nearest town to sell his truck. The housewives he met asked him what he had for sale.

"Radishes, lettuce, beets, kohlrabi," said Arthur.

"What's the last word?" asked a housewife.

"Kohlrabi."

"Never heard of it," said the woman.

"It's fine," said Arthur. "I'll get my mother to write out some respies for you."

Arthur did, and he gained a good customer. His sales have gone up to four dollars a day. The horse is nearly paid for. He keeps account of his expenses, separating income from his own patch, from what he has earned on truck bought from other boys.

Another man, John C. Woodlock of St. Louis, with a salary of never more than $115 a month saved $20,000 after thirty-five years' work, which he invested in real estate and his monthly income from rents is now $150 a month.

Mr. Woodlock's rules for getting rich honestly are worth noting. They are as follows:

"Marry an economical woman, who will help you to get ahead.

"Watch the nickels and see that they are not wasted.

"Don't go into debt for household or personal expenses—you always have to pay more for what you get.

"Pay cash, but going into debt on an investment is a good thing. It makes you save.

"Don't squander money on amusements. A good play once a month is sufficient for the average person.

"Have plenty of good food. That is economy, for it saves doctor's bills."

So we see thrift is a habit, just as wastefulness, extravagance and carelessness are habits, and the thrift habit can be acquired, but not in a day or all at one time, and it takes patience and time and self-denials unless the habit was early formed in a home of thrift.

Co-operation in Encouraging Song Birds

By Allan Stephens, Columbus, Ohio

I am glad to see that so many persons are co-operating in encouraging song birds to come back and remain with us again. I have recently seen numbers of robins, meadow larks, blackbirds, thrushes, bluejays and other birds.

Here is a suggestion: Kill all English sparrows, for they eat the eggs of song birds and tear up their nests. These sparrows eat nothing but the farmers' grain, while song birds earn their keep by the insects they destroy as well as the songs they sing for us.

While robins eat a few cherries, they more than earn their bread with the good they do elsewhere. If a cherry orchard is surrounded with a row of mulberry trees the robins will hardly touch the cherries.

Blackbirds are not such nuisances in the garden or in the orchard as people imagine.

Small boys should be encouraged to leave the birds alone. Hunters should spare song birds.

Cats are great enemies of birds, but I believe they can be taught to leave them alone.

The Tailor Who Paid Too Much

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

I WAS buying a cigar last week when a man dropped into the shop and after making a purchase told the proprietor that he had started a clothes shop around the corner and quoted him prices, with the assurance of best garments and terms.

After he left the cigar man turned to me and said:

"Enterprising fellow, that, he'll get along."

"But he won't," I replied, "and, furthermore, I'll wager you that he hasn't the sort of clothes shop that will enable him to."

"What made you think that?" queried the man behind the counter.

"His theories are wrong," I explained; "he's relying upon word of mouth publicity to build up his business and he can't interview enough individuals to compete with a merchant who has sense enough to say the same things he told you, to a thousand men, while he is telling it to one. Besides, his method of advertising is too expensive. Suppose he sees a hundred persons every day. First of all, he is robbing his business of its necessary direction and besides, he is spending too much to reach every man he solicits."

"I don't quite follow you."

"Well, as the proprietor of a clothes shop his own time is so valuable that I am very conservative in my estimate when I put the cost of his soliciting at five cents a head.

"Now, if he were really able and clever he would discover that he can talk to thousands of people at a tenth of a cent per individual. There is not a newspaper in town the advertising rate of which is $1.00 per thousand circulation, for a space big enough in which to display what he said to you."

"I never looked at it that way," said the cigar man.

It's only "the man who hasn't looked at it that way," who hesitates for an instant over the advisability and profitableness of newspaper publicity.

Newspaper advertising is the cheapest channel of communication ever established by man. A thousand letters with one-cent stamps, will easily cost fifteen dollars and not one envelope in ten will be opened because the very postage is an invitation to the waste-basket.

If there were anything cheaper rest assured that the greatest merchants in America would not spend individual sums ranging up to half a million dollars a year and over, upon this form of attracting trade.

TRUCK CROPS IN NEW YORK

New York, Delaware and Iowa are the only states promising as much as a 100 per cent production of cabbage this year, based on conditions on August 15, according to a reprint just issued by the bureau or crop estimates of the U. S. department of agriculture. The two principal cabbage producing states are New York and Wisconsin.

Bad Season for Onions

The condition of onions for the state of New York on August 15 was reported at 70 per cent of a normal crop.

In Wayne county the condition was reported at 49 per cent, and the probable total production was reported at 53 per cent of the average total production of recent years, both acreage and yield per acre being considered.

The reports from Orange county show a condition of 83 per cent of a normal crop, and a probable total production of 95 per cent of an average crop. A special agent of this bureau recently traveled through these counties, studying conditions and acreage. There are approximately 9,000 acres in onions in these two counties, or about 75 per cent of the total acreage planted to this crop in the state. In Wayne and Orange counties there is an increase of from 15 per cent over the acreage of last year, which, it is thought, will equalize the loss in production caused by an unusually wet season. The excessive moisture caused the crop to mature earlier than usual, and with the ravages of the onion thrips, and blight, all combined to reduce the size of the onions grown.

The weather conditions that have been fatal to onions have been ideal for cabbages except in low places, and the reports show that throughout the country the crop has been practically free from the ravages of insect pests and disease. There is, therefore, every indication that under continued favorable conditions an unusually large crop of cabbage will be harvested throughout the northern belt.

JOHN BOLAND'S PETITIONS ARE BEING CIRCULATED

Petitions are being circulated advocating the nomination of John Boland former Mayor, for Mayor on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Boland conducts a cigar-factory on West Broadway in partnership with his brother, and is particularly strong in the First and Second wards.

So far no other Democratic choice has appeared on the horizon and the chances are favorable for Mr. Boland nomination at the primaries. Mr. Boland's supporters are confident that he is the man to swing the voters toward a Democratic administration.

TREES PLANTED TOO THICKLY

Mistake Made by Many People Who Set Out the Desirable Shade for the Summer Days.

A week ago the writer saw a street where trees had just been planted but twenty-five feet apart. There is no tree large enough for street use that should be planted so thickly. Could every other one be taken out at the end of ten years from planting, no fault could be found with the scheme.

At a score of years after planting, pepper trees are close enough at 60 feet apart. For the first ten years they could well be maintained at 30 feet apart; but who will cut away the offending alternates when the time is ripe? Unfortunately, all are left, to form a solid wall of green on each side of the street so that no glimpse of anything may be seen outside this narrow and uninteresting channel dubbed, usually, "a beautiful avenue of living green," a serious misnomer. Each tree should be silhouetted against the sky so that its individuality may be seen, its beauty of outline, grace of carriage, form and color of foliage and flower, and also that a clear view may be had of both the near and the distant landscape. Let in the glorious sunshine and air; also let them out, and have landscape views as free. Neither fence in anything or fence out anything. The trees may with propriety be made to appropriate their just share of the territory and the view, but no more. There should be other rights and other places for other objects.—Los Angeles Times.

FOR THE GOOD OF THE TOWN

Ten Commandments That Are Worth Heeding by the Citizens of Any Community.

These Ten Commandments for the spring clean-up are just as good in this town as they were in Winfield, Kan., where the Courier printed them:

Thou shalt honor thy neighborhood and keep it clean.

Remember thy cleaning day and keep it wholly.

Thou shalt take care of thy rubbish heap else thy neighbor will bear witness against thee.

Thou shalt keep in order thy alley, thy back yard, thy hall and thy stairway.

Thou shalt not let the wicked fly breed on thy premises.

Thou shalt not kill thy neighbor by ignoring fire menaces or by poisoning the air with foul odors.

Thou shalt not keep thy windows closed day and night.

Thou shalt support the city, county and state health officers in their work and obey their instructions.

Thou shalt eat less, breathe deeper, rise earlier and bathe oftener.

These things do that thy days may be long and healthy upon the earth.

Setting Out Trees and Shrubs.

Now is the time to set out trees and shrubs. In setting any plant of this kind in a new location it is necessary for the hole to be large enough to allow the roots to be spread out. The soil should be worked around the roots, as every space under them will mean just that amount of idle root. Too many empty spaces under the roots mean a dead tree or shrub. When the earth is filled in it should be tramped in as firmly as possible. It is sometimes desirable to wet down the soil to make it pack more firmly. The soil particles must be forced against the roots to enable the soil water to be carried to them through the action of capillary attraction. Many of the failures in transplanting come from permitting the soil to lie too lightly over the roots.

School Children Make Bird Houses.

The boys and girls of the Columbus public school, under the direction of one of the teachers, are making bird houses. They have already made twenty, of sizes ranging from one to nine rooms. These are intended for the martins, especially, since they consume such numbers of destructive insects. The old idea that the only use a boy has for a bird is as a target for stones and airgun is surely dying out in progressive communities. Intelligent people, old and young, recognize birds as invaluable friends to the farmer, the fruit grower and the gardener and protect them as such. We are glad to note that several Brookville boys are providing houses for wrens and bluebirds and are thus doing their part in this good work.—Brookville American.

Against Billboards.

Several hundred women in Firwood, Pa., have started a crusade to place under the ban every store, theater and other business that uses billboards as an advertising medium.

Pride in the Home.

Many men are determined to beautify their home grounds this summer even if they have to make their wives do the work.—South Bend News-Times.

WOMEN PAY ALIMONY.

Another Anti Argument Refuted by Stern Facts.

One of those "privileges of woman" whose possession, it is said, ought to prohibit her from having even so much as a desire for the vote has been accounted the receiving of alimony. Here comes along a new set of facts which puts 6,354 men into the same "privileged class." These are not new cases brought about by the new and restless woman; they are cases recorded within the United States divorce courts from the year 1887 to 1906. And they are actual receivers, not merely seekers, of alimony. The latter class would add another 2,000 to the number. The aggrieved wife who seeks support from her ex-husband gets it in about 72 per cent of the instances. The aggrieved husband gets it in about 70 per cent.

Now, this is not a suffrage state custom. The greatest number of male alimony receivers hails from Ohio, that state which the "antis" claim as one most bitterly opposed to woman suffrage. In fact, none of the older suffrage states shines in this list at all. Incidentally, it may be news to the antis to learn that the greatest field of divorce is not inside suffrage territory, but in the north central division, where nearly half of all the divorces in the United States were granted in the two decades in question. So these extra privileged men, who should be reminded that they are jeopardizing special advantages by using their ballots, are found to be 673 in Ohio, 443 in Michigan, 243 in Nebraska—all states which have recently refused the ballot to "privileged" women.

A Lesson From a Beggar.

"It was a street beggar who made me feel my insignificance," said former United States Senator Chauncey M. Depew, "and he did it in a gracious way. I was a trifle out of sorts when I said to him, 'You can't hold me up.'

"'Not even as a good example,' he replied, lifting his hat."—Youth's Companion.

Breaking a Mass of Iron.

A simple way of breaking a mass of iron is explained by an engineer. In a mass two feet square and four feet long he bored a perpendicular hole one inch in diameter and between three and four inches deep. This he filled with water and closed with an accurately fitting iron bolt. One heavy blow on this bolt broke the mass into two pieces.

$10,000,000 A MONTH IS SENT TO BELGIUM.

Whereas Edward J. Williams, the treasurer who disbursed the funds to meet the cost of the construction of the Panama canal, paid out $2,000,000 per month on the average during the years 1905-13, he, as assistant treasurer of the commission for relief in Belgium, has been distributing $10,000,000 per month since the German occupation became effective, says the Chicago Christian Advocate. The economy with which this fund has been administered by the commission and its splendid system of distributing food, regularly, promptly and economically, suggests to William B. Parker, the official historian of the commission, that we have here a practical illustration of how successful collective marketing for an entire nation may be.

NOTHING NEW ABOUT SUFFRAGE

Few Countries Left on Civilized Globe Where Women Are Not at Least Partly Enfranchised.

Will New York Be First Eastern State to Grant Full Suffrage?

The reactionary who refers to woman suffrage as "an innovation" and shivers and shakes over the awful prospect of trying a political expedient so "new and unproved" might feel better about it if he would familiarize himself with certain salient facts in suffrage history.

Woman suffrage is not new. It has been proved. Country by country, year by year, either partial or full suffrage has been put into effect the world over until today there is hardly a country on the civilized globe that has not enfranchised its women to some extent. The only thing left undone is to complete the enfranchisement. Here in America the eleven states in which women have full suffrage, plus Illinois, in which they can vote for the president of the United States, by no means tell the nearly finished story of the enfranchisement of American women. As a matter of fact, there are only fourteen states in the Union that do not already give women partial suffrage. In twenty-two states women have bond, school or taxation suffrage.

What is true of America is true of other lands. It began in 1838, when Kentucky granted school suffrage to widows with children of school age.

A banner year was 1869. That year England granted municipal suffrage to single women and widows. Victoria granted municipal suffrage to married and single women. Wyoming granted full suffrage, the first state to grant full suffrage to women.

From 1869 to 1881 school suffrage made great strides. Some of the states granting school suffrage were Michigan, Minnesota, Colorado, New Hampshire, Oregon, Massachusetts, New York, Vermont and New Zealand. Western Australia and South Australia granted municipal suffrage, and Scotland granted municipal suffrage to single women and widows. In 1881 the Isle of Man granted parliamentary suffrage.

Another banner year was 1887, when Kansas, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Arizona and New Jersey granted women either school or municipal suffrage. In 1888-9 England gave county suffrage, British Columbia municipal suffrage, Scotland county suffrage, the province of Quebec municipal suffrage to single women and widows.

From 1893 to 1898 only one year stands out in which women were not granted some kind of suffrage over a wide range of countries. In France women engaged in commerce were given the right to vote for judges of the tribunal court. Ireland gave women the right to vote for all officers except members of parliament. South Australia, Idaho and Utah gave women full suffrage. England gave parish and district suffrage to married and single women.

In 1900, 1901 and 1902 some notable victories were won. Western Australia gave women full suffrage, New South Wales full suffrage, Australia full suffrage, New York taxpaying suffrage and Norway municipal suffrage. In 1903 Tasmania gave full suffrage. In 1905 Queensland gave full suffrage. In 1906 Finland gave full suffrage. In 1908 Victoria gave full suffrage.

In 1911 California gave full suffrage, the biggest victory the women had won in the west. Honduras gave municipal suffrage in its capital city, Belize. Iceland gave parliamentary suffrage for women over twenty-five years of age. In 1912 suffrage boomed anew, Oregon, Arizona and Kansas giving full suffrage. In 1913 Alaska and Norway gave full suffrage and Illinois gave limited suffrage. In 1914 Iceland, Montana and Nevada gave full suffrage.

In 1915 Denmark freed her women and the action of the Icelandic parliament was sustained by the king of Denmark's signature, thus completing the enfranchisement of Iceland's women. New York has already given women the school and taxpaying suffrage in villages. In November the state will have a chance to be first over the line in the east to enroll for full suffrage. That is why from the Hudson to the lakes you hear little else today but "Vote for the woman suffrage amendment, Nov. 2, 1915."

"The population of New York state is 1,004,145 larger than all the woman suffrage states combined."—Circular Issued by the Man Suffrage Association Opposed to anything of the kind for women.

The population of Montana is	375,053
Idaho	325,594
Wyoming	145,965
Colorado	799,024
Arizona	204,354
Utah	373,351
Nevada	81,875
Washington	1,141,990
Oregon	672,765
California	2,377,549
Kansas	1,690,949
Illinois	5,638,591
	13,828,060
The population of New York state is	9,113,614
Surplus	4,714,446

So the population of New York state is less than that of the suffrage states by 4,714,446 instead of larger by 1,064,145. But what's an error of 5,778,591 to an anti?

VOTES AND DIVORCES.

From 1902 to 1906 the increase in divorces in Colorado was less than one-half of what it was in a number of man suffrage states.

In Colorado the increase was 49.2 per cent. In California divorces decreased 12.8 per cent in that time.

Note this—divorces meantime increased in Indian Territory and Oklahoma 91 and 73 per cent, in Florida 83.5 per cent, in Mississippi 54.6 per cent, in North Dakota 56.6 per cent and in Louisiana 69.7 per cent. From 1887 to 1891 divorces increased 115.2 per cent in Nebraska and 107.8 in Louisiana. In South Dakota between 1882 and 1886 they increased 287.4 per cent, decreasing in the same period in Utah and Nevada.

Probably you know that Colorado, California, Utah and Nevada, where the showing is best for permanency of the marriage bond, are suffrage states.

GREATER CHICAGO.

How She Worsts New York at the Polls.

There are more voters in the city of Chicago than in the city of New York.

There were in New York in the presidential election of 1912, 627,864 voters; in the gubernatorial election of 1914, 481,444 voters.

There registered in Chicago in the mayoralty election, April 6, 1915, 486,815 men and 282,291 women, a total of 769,106.

Eighty-seven per cent of those registered voted, 88 per cent of the men and 86 per cent of the women.

The vote in Chicago April 6, 1915, was 426,094 men, 243,797 women; total, 669,891.

By adding her women Chicago increases the strength of her electorate, even in a mayoralty election, by 40,000 more votes than New York can muster for a presidential election.

Humanitarianism In a Suffrage State.

On a program of the Orpheum theater, Denver, appears this: "Don't kill your wife. Let the Western Columbia Laundry do the work."

With us it is a question what to do with our ex-presidents; for Mexico, what will the ex-presidents do with her.

How to Use the Succulent Onion as Medicine.

Onions supply a complete cure in themselves for cold, as well as being a wonderful remedy in cases of insomnia. An onion cure breakfast includes a poached egg on toast, three tablespoonfuls of fried onions and a cup of coffee. Luncheons of sandwiches made of brown bread, buttered and filled with fine chopped raw onion, seasoned with salt and pepper, make the second meal on the schedule. For the supper the onions may be fried as for breakfast and eaten with a chop and a baked potato. The efficacy of onions is well known to the singers of Italy and Spain, who eat them every day to improve the quality of their voices and keep them smooth. Onion plasters are prescribed to break up hard coughs. They are made of fried onion placed between two slices of old muslin. The plaster is kept quite hot until the patient is snugly in bed, when it is placed on the chest, to stay overnight. Onion sirup is claimed by some to be unequaled as a cure for a bad cold in the chest.

RIGHT OR EXPEDIENT, OR BOTH?

By ROSE YOUNG.

TO the shortsighted it never seems expedient to apply great principles to life broadly and fairly and truly. There were colonists who deemed George Washington an irresponsible firebrand for doing anything so inexpedient as to lead a weak young colony to war with its powerful mother country. But he marched in the face of expediency to the victory of the principle for which he was willing to sacrifice everything. It was not at all expedient for the early Christians to believe in the principles that Christ taught them. If they had listened to the shortsighted the fires of their faith must have been soon chilled by those who were always on hand to point out how poorly such "doctrines of irresponsibility" would apply to life and how menacing they were to the "welfare of the state." But the early Christians didn't listen. They believed and died for the privilege of believing.

You might think we had come a little way since the days when expediency nailed principle to the cross—defamed and burned and tortured those who held principle supreme. But we haven't come so very far. To this day it is dangerous to believe with a belief that surpasses the hue and cry of expediency. To this day to voice such belief is to invite the raucous cry of criticism. Witness the case of Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, testifying in the Evening Post special suffrage number to her faith in the righteousness of suffrage, whatever suppositious scares the anti-democratic may drum up. Questions, she says, are constantly being raised in connection with the working of equal suffrage which seem to her to have nothing to do with it. "Mere suppositions, not based on fact, intended to befog the unthinking person," she calls them.

"If women had the ballot they wouldn't use it!" cries an anti. Even so, Dr. Shaw believes in suffrage.

"If women vote they will vote wrong!" cries another anti. But the cry leaves Dr. Shaw's suffrage faith unshaken.

"Women won't love their husbands, they will forsake their homes, they will refuse to be mothers of children!" comes the final challenge, growing vicious with desperation. The challenge ricochets futilely from Dr. Shaw's armor of belief. She wonders that any one should expect to damage principle ever so slightly by these mere suppositions, NOT BASED ON FACT.

Belief that is at the mercy of the winds of expediency is not belief; it is mere sham and self deception. Dr. Shaw's belief in suffrage is real. Her consecration to principle is unswerving. The antis cannot understand it.

What the Antis Think of Men.

In a pamphlet issued by the Guidon Club a "college woman opposed to woman suffrage" pays the following compliment to congressmen:

"Yesterday it was my privilege to listen to the arguments presented by members of the house of representatives for and against woman suffrage, and as I listened I for one woman thanked God that I had no vote and therefore was not responsible for the specimens of statesmanship that I beheld. Shades of our forefathers! What has happened to the mantle of Jefferson?"

Which Votes—Population or Territory?

By CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT

A SUFFRAGE slogan much used has been: "Women vote in nearly half the territory of the United States. Why not in New York?" Our opponents make the reply, "Population votes, not territory."

Which is right?

Take the eleven states Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington, California, Oregon, Arizona, Kansas, Nebraska, Montana. These are complete woman suffrage states, where women vote in every election in which men are entitled to vote. Add the state of Illinois, where women may vote for president, for all municipal officers and for many state officers, but not for all. The population of these twelve states in 1910 was 13,828,060. Each one of these states has two senators, twenty-four votes in all, in the United States senate. Now take twelve other states—Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan. The population is 36,146,743. Men only vote in these states. They have the same number of senators as the suffrage states. In other words, 36,146,743 of population cast twenty-four votes in the United States senate in these eastern states, whereas 13,828,060 in the western states cast an equal number of votes.

Is this population or territory voting? Little Nevada has only 81,875 people; but it has as many votes in the United States senate as New York with its 9,113,614. Which votes—territory or population?

What does the United States senate vote about? The president, with the consent and approval of the senate, has complete control over all diplomatic relations with foreign countries. The senate ratifies every treaty with a foreign government. It ratifies appointments of all ambassadors, consuls and special emissaries to foreign countries. It ratifies the appointment of the judges of the supreme court and other high officials. No treaty can be ratified without the consent of two-thirds majority of the senate. The senate consists of ninety-six senators. In the sixty-four votes which constitute a two-thirds majority twenty-four votes cast by the western senators, who are elected by the votes of men and women jointly, is decidedly a controlling number. So it happens that half the territory of the United States, with its 13,000,000 of population, has precisely the same influence over our foreign policies as is exercised by the 36,000,000 of people in the east.

The population of the western states is increasing enormously. The population per square mile has about doubled itself between the years 1890 and 1912 in five states where women vote—Oregon, Montana, Colorado, Arizona and Nevada. It increased threefold in Wyoming and more than threefold in Washington and Idaho in the same period. Within ten years Washington and Idaho increased their populations 120.4 per cent and 101.3 per cent respectively, whereas the population of Iowa at the same time has decreased 3 per cent. For every couple, man and woman, in this rapidly filling western territory there are now two votes. For every couple, man and woman, in the unenfranchised East there is but one.

In the presidential election of 1916, instead of a voting strength of less than 5,000,000, equal suffrage states will produce an electorate of 5,354,956. This is more than four times the present voting strength of all New England taken together. It is more than one and a half the total electorate of the thirteen states in the solid south. The suffrage presidential electorate in woman suffrage territory is stronger by 1,412,786 than that of the four suffrage campaign states, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

A hundred years ago a doubting world sneered at manhood suffrage in the young American republic because its population was small, but those who had the vision to see knew that manhood suffrage had come to stay; that population would grow and the republic become a power among the nations of earth. So those who have eyes to see know that woman suffrage has come to stay and will sweep over the United States, realizing soon the boasted claim that ours is a government of the PEOPLE.

Area does vote, and the population is coming.

Washington, Sept. 7.—The balance in the general fund of the National Treasury on August 23 was $55,760,889 as compared with $126,663,944 on the corresponding date two years ago under Republican revenue and appropriation laws. The administration spent $27,382,411 more than it collected during the first 54 days of the present fiscal year.

Though the people of this country undoubtedly want a permanent, nonpartisan tariff commission they don't want it appointed by a Democratic president who will select a majority of its members from among men who are opposed to a scientific protective tariff. They want a tariff commission created by the friends of the protection principle. They want it to ascertain the facts and submit those facts to Congress for its guidance in determining the amount of duty necessary to give the American wage earner adequate protection from the cheap labor of foreign countries. They want a tariff commission not subservient to the White House but acting in its own right and according to its own judgment under authority of law definitely prescribing its powers and duties. They want a commission governed by law and under no obligations to a Democratic president who opposes the principle of a protective tariff.

Under date of August 16, Democratic papers carried dispatches saying that "President Woodrow Wilson today began the task of mapping out his program for national defense." There was remarkable truth in that word "began." Only a short while ago President Wilson was declaring that there has been no neglect of national defense. The platform on which Wilson was elected was silent on preparedness. The Republican platform was drawn by men who had both the knowledge to understand national needs and the courage to say what they believed. They wrote these words:

"We believe in the maintenance of an adequate navy for the national defense and we condemn the action of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing to authorize the construction of battle ships."

On August 16, 1915, when he began planning for national defense, President Wilson paid a magnificent tribute to the wisdom, foresight and courage of the men who wrote the Republican platform in June, 1912.

The New York Times Annalist Index Number on wholesale prices of 25 leading articles of food for the second week in August, 1915, was 145.17, compared with 139 for the second week in August, 1913, under Republican law. The Index Number for the year 1914 was 146.07 compared with 139.98 for the year 1913.

HIGH SCHOOL MEN LINED UP FOR COLLEGE

Within the next few weeks, many young Fultonians will leave the city to enter colleges and universities in all sections of the country. Many intend taking a college course this year but have not decided on the institution. Among those who are already registered are Thomas Johnston, who will enter the Sophomore class in Finance and Banking at the University of Pennsylvania; Harold Caffrey and James Fairgrieve, who will enter Princeton University; Markey Pullen, who recently received an appointment to the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis and who will take his entrance examination in two weeks; Bernard Jones, Don Cavanaugh, Stanley Hare and Winfred Perry, students at Syracuse University; Francis Murphy, Barney Whitcomb and Andrew Currier who will enter Mercersburg Academy.

CATHOLIC SCHOOL OPENS MONDAY

Sessions to Be Held in Basement Until Building Receives Finishing Touches—Priest Defends System.

St. Mary's parochial school will open Monday next, according to an announcement made by Rev. Father J. L. Lindsman at the masses in the Church of the Immaculate Conception Sunday. For several weeks the classes will be held in the basement of the building, owing to the work on the upper floors, where the woodwork, desks, black boards and other details will not be installed until October 1, or later.

In his sermon, Father Lindsman took as his text the words of the Gospel, "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." His sermon was an eloquent plea for support of the school by the parents of the children in the parish. He defended the parochial school system against the attacks of persons who claim it is un-American.

"The parochial school system and the system of having schools in connection with, and supported by churches is more American than the present public school system in its origin," said Father Lindsman, "In the early part of the last century every school in the country was supported by some religious body. As time went on, the public schools in New York were created and one by one, other religious denominations ceased to provide schools. The Catholics and the Lutherans, I believe, are now the only denominations who support schools for the children.

Father Lindsman read a letter from Bishop Grimes, of the Syracuse dioceses, in which the Bishop announced plans for the erection of a Home for the Aged of the diocese. The cost of the home will be subscribed by all the parishes of the diocese and four months' time will be allotted for the collection of the subscriptions. The Bishop spoke of the many aged who have not friends, of those who are turned away by their own relatives and of those who find themselves financially able to live, but with no means to secure the attention necessary for their spiritual and physical welfare. All these, the Bishop wrote, will find a haven in the Home for the Aged, and some of the Sisters of the diocese will conduct the institution. Father Lindsman urged the support of the congregation in this charitable work and said he would announce the names of those who will have charge of the collection in this city later in the week.

MURPHY AND WHITCOMB BEGIN THEIR TRAINING

Francis Murphy of West Broadway and Barney Whitcomb of the West River road, two Fulton High school alumni who will enter Mercersburg Academy this fall, have already received training instructions for the football squad from Tom Nolan, the famous Mercersburg athletic team trainer. Nolan has just returned from a trip to England and last week he sent out preliminary instructions to all candidates for the foot ball team who will report this fall.

Murphy made an enviable record on the track and in foot ball at the Academy last year and he has introduced Whitcomb to enter the school. Whitcomb was a tower of strength on the Fulton High school eleven and Murphy is confident that his protege will make a name for himself at the Pennsylvania institution. Murphy will try for a position in the backfield this year and Whitcomb will go out for the line. Murphy is recognized as one of the fastest sprinters in the Academy and only illness last year prevented him from winning his letters.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 7.—The proposed amendment to the State Constitution which amends Secton 11 of Article 8, in relation to the powers and duties of the State commission in lunacy, which proposition has been accepted by the Constitutional Convention and will be submitted to the people, is simple in its purport. It is a separate department of the State lunacy commission and cuts the strings of identification with the department of the fiscal supervisor which has connected the two departments.

In 1894 the power of visitation and inspection visitation was given the lunacy commission and in 1893 financial control wasg iven under the proposed amendment both of these statutory powers are Constitutionalized. The result is that if adopted by the people, the amendment will prevent legislative acts affecting the prerogatives of the commission, but as a matter of fact, it will have no greater powers than at present enjoyed.

Section 11 of Article 8 of the Constitution as amended and submitted to the people will read:

"The legislature shall provide for a State board of charities, which will visit and inspect all institutions, whether State, county, municipal, incorporated or not incorporated, which are of a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional or reformatory character, excepting only those institutions as are hereby made subject to the visitation and inspection of either the commissions, hereinafter mentione but including all reformatories except those in which adult males convicted of felony shall be confined, a State commission in lunacy, in which shall remain the management and fiscal control of the State hospitals for the insane (not including institutions for criminals or convicts) except in so far as such management may now or hereafter be delegated by the legislature to local boards ofm anagers, and which shall visit and inspect all institutions, either public or private used for the care and treatment of the insane (not including institutions for epileptics or idiots); a State commission of prisons which shall visit and inspect all institutions used for the detention of sane adults charged witho r convicted of crime, or detained as witnesses or debtors."

The above amendment was vigorously opposed by the State department of charity, the officials of which department deeming it unwise to make the contemplated change. The lunacy commission, however, was enthusiastically for the amendment.

The result of the proposition above set forth will more positively define the jurisdiction of the State lunacy commission: Heretofore the State board of charities and the State fiscal supervisor of State charities had certain authority over the institutions which were visited and administered practically by the State lunacy commission.

Another effect will be that its provisions, coupled with those incorporated in the short ballot proposition will mean that the office of State superintendent of prisons will be abolished.

The importance of the proposed amendments to Section 11 of Article 8 will be readily seen when it is known that the largest amount spent by the State each year is for charities and the care and maintenance of the mentally deficient.

Give The Evening Times a trial. It has all the news about all the people you know, and then some more.

EXPLAINS CONFLICT IN GAME LAW DATES

Albany, Sept. 7.—To answer the flood of inquiries that are pouring in upon the Conservation Commission on account of the conflict of dates between state and Federal regulations defining the open season for game birds, the commission has just issued a special circular summarizing the state law and also the open season under the Federal migratory bird act.

According to this circular, the season for some birds begins earlier under the state law than under the Federal regulations. In all such cases, however, the Federal date must be observed, to avoid violation of the act of Congress protecting migratory birds. Thus the opening date for some species is delayed two weeks beyond that set in the state law.

A similar difference in closing dates operates to shorten the season. Accordingly, to bes ure of observing both laws, sportsmen must observe the latest date for opening and the earliest fore losing for each species. The commission has condensed the dates within which birds may be lawfully taken under both laws as follows:

Take water-fowl from October 1st to January 16th, except wood duck and swan, for which there is no open season under either law.

Take rails, American coots, mud hens and gallinules from September 16th to December 1st.

Take woodcock from October 1st to November 15th, except on Long Island where the season is from October 15th to November 30th.

Take only black-breasted and golden plover, jacksnipe or Wilson snipe and the greater and lesser yellow legs from September 116th to November 30th, except on Long Island where the season is from August 15th to November 30th.

FINLEY OPPOSES WAR TRAINING IN SCHOOL

Kingston, N. Y., Sept. 7.—John H. Finley, state commissioner of education, in speaking at the dedication of a high school building here today, declared he was opposed to military training in the public schools. He added that he would fight with all of the "personal and official might" to prevent the introduction of such training.

"The vice-president of the United States is reported to have said recently that we ought to introduce military instruction in our schools," he said. "And others in high position are making like suggestion.

"Against such a program I have protested and would continue to protest, not because I object to the drill in itself, for I do not, but because I think we ought not to make that which implies a eprpetuation of international hatreds and brutish warfare a purposeful feature of the education of our hhildren. I can, though with difficulty, conceive of conditions which might make such emergency training necessary."

WHITMAN'S PLEA FOR DEPARTMENT

Health Should Receive First Consideration---More Important Than Preparedness for Defence, He Says.

Rochester, N. Y., September 7. — Regret that the legislation had failed to make adequate appropriations for the work of the State Department of Health was expressed by Governor Charles S. Whitman in an address here tonight before the American Public Health Association.

Governor Whitman said that, while the infant death rate for the state outside of New York City was 120 in 1913, it had been reduced to ninety-eight for the first seven months of this year, a reduction of twenty-two points.

"This higher ethical standards and the broad humanitarianism which have developed among large masses of the people of these recent years imperatively demand that the health and social activities of the government shall be absolutely divorced from politics. Such has been the record, in my judgment, of the administration of the state department of health since its reorganization under the revised public health law, and such activities in the state government during the reminder of my administration as Governor.

"I greatly regret that the legislature at its last session did not make appropriations adequate to fully maintain the worko fc ertain divisions of the state department ofh ealth, and especially the division of sanitary supervisors, whose work has proved most important and beneficial to the local ccommunities and by means of whom the knowledge and skill of the expert sanitarians of the department of health are placed at the disposal of the health officers of even the most remote rural districts.

"I sincerely hope that some means may be found by which the services of these physicians may be retained and feel confident that next year, when the numbers of the legislature are made fully acquainted with the facts as to the value of these services, funds will be provided fofr their continuance. I shall use my influence to attain this end, for, while rigid economy in the administration of the finances of the state is essential, savings in expenditures attained through decreased efficiency in health work are not only unwise, but resolve them selves in the end into irreparable waste of the most valuable resources of commonwealth.

"The promise of the commissioner of health made at the beginning of the year to save 25,000 lives in the state in five years seems almost certain of realization if the necessary support is accorded to the department in its work. We are confident this pledge will be more than redeemed. To the attainment of this splendid goal I pledge my cordial and hearty support so long as I am Governor. I trust that New York may not only wage a successful war against preventable disease within her own borders, but that her example may be of some assistance to you who are fighting the same battles through the length and breadth of the North American Continent.

"The crowning glory of this twentieth century is to be found not in the great industrial progress and development, not in the marvelous scientific discoveries, not in the incredible expansion and efficiency of its military organization, but in the improvement in the social condition of the masses and in the higher standards of living, rendered possible to a large extent because the losses from sickess and death have been so enormously reduced by the extraordnary developments in preventive medicine and sanitary science. To Posteur and Lister and Koch and Behring and Ehrlich in Europe and to Reed, Flexner and Theobald Smith and Gorgas, who is with us tonight, in thisc ountry to them and their associate workers in scientific medicine is the greater honor due."

FARM HEALTH DECLARED BAD

State Department of Health Discusses Sanitation and Has Special Number of Bulletin.

Albany, September 6.—The State Department of Health, in a series of articles by leading sanitarians and persons interested in the improvement of rural life, in the current number of the "Health News" presents important information on rural sanitation and hygiene.

"It has been pointed out as a striking and surprising fact that the death rate in the rural communities of New York State is higher than that of the crowded city of New York," says the leading Editorial of the "News." "A part of this difference is no doubt due to the fact that there is a higher proportion of old people in the rural communities, and a large proportion of old people means a higher death rate, other things being equal. Whatever the importance of this comparison of city and country statistics may be, there can be no doubt of the fact that, while the New York City death rate has dropped about one-third in thel ast fifteen years, the rural death rate has remained stationary. It has been about 15 per 1,000 up and down a little, since 1900. We do not want this rural death rate to be stationary any longer. In the country the farmer must be his own sanitary engineer and to a large degree his own board of health. There are many things which the State and local health officials cannot do for him, but they can help him to do them for himself."

"Open air life in the country, among the woods and in the fields, is the sort of life man was made for; but we must add to the blessings of nature the gifts of modern science as well."

The News contains an article on "Good Health and Good Farming" by Dr. Liberty Hyde Bailey, formerly Dean of the College of Agriculture, Cornell University; "The Farm Water Supply" by Prof. Henry N. Ogden of Cornell; "The Disposal of Human Excreta and Sewage of the Country Home" by Mr. Theodore Horton, Director of the Division of Sanitary Engineering of the State Department of Health; and an article on "The Extermination of the Mosquito" by Dr. Alvah H. Doty, former Health Officer of the Port of New York.

The Department wishes to make the information contained in this number of the News available to every resident of the rural districts of the State, and will send a copy of the News, or the information contained therein, to anyone applying for it by post card.

REMARKABLE REFRIGERATOR RECORD

On the first morning of the County Fair we put a 25c piece of ice in one of our White Mountain Refrigerators over on the fair grounds. Said refrigerator stood during the four days of the fair, within six feet of the Andes coal range, which baked the hundreds of biscuits given away during the fair. When the refrigerator was moved back to our store at the close of the fair, we took out and threw away a piece of ice nearly as large as a peck measure, what was left of the original piece and after cooling the contents of the refrigerator for four days. Surely a remarkable record. What refrigerator but a White Mountain could do as much?

Rather than carry over the several we have left, we will cut the price just $10 each from original price.

ROBERT HILLIARD'S Extraordinary Success

A Dramatization of Kipling's World-wide Poem "THE VAMPIRE" by Porter Emerson Browne

"THERE are two roads through life—even as there are two loves; the one is rough and weary and on it happiness seldom treads, that is the road of the White Rose."

A fool there was and he made his prayer,
(Even as you and I!)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair
(We called her the woman that did not care)
But the fool called her his lady fair.
(Even as you and I!)

"BUT the road of the Red Rose! That is different. There the flowers bloom, birds sing. There comes the soft wash of th sea, the silent whispers of the breeze. The call of love! Which road do you choose? My fool, which road"

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the Golden churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

NOTABLES IN THE LIMELIGHT

Archduke of Austria, Who May Be King of Poland.

Since the final partition of Poland in 1795 between Russia, Austria and Prussia that one time kingdom of central Europe has been a nation only in name. Long before that time, however, it had begun to decline. In the partition Russia got as her share more than three-fourths of the original kingdom, which in the third quarter of the sixteenth century was the most powerful in central Europe, with an area of 380,000 square miles and a population of 35,000,000.

Since the fall of Warsaw there have been rumors that Poland is again to be a kingdom, and it is said that the Archduke Charles Stephen of Austria will be proclaimed king.

The archduke, a cousin of the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, was born at Gross-Seelowitz on Sept. 5, 1860, the son of the Archduke Charles Ferdinand. He married Maria Theresa in 1886 in Vienna, and they have six children, the eldest son being Archduke Charles Albert, who is an artillery officer in the Austrian army.

Archduke Charles Stephen holds the rank of an admiral in the German navy and is honorary colonel of the Eighth regiment of infantry. He is a knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece and holds the Golden Cross of Honor of the Order of Malta. He is a knight of the Order of the Elephant and of the Order of the Black Eagle.

Federal Trade Commission.

The new federal trade commission, which is now going from city to city conferring with business men in relation to the trade of the nation, was created by act of congress on Sept. 26, 1914. Like the interstate commerce commission, which has jurisdiction over the railroads, it is an independent body and is accountable to congress and not to any member of the cabinet. The commissioners are appointed by the president for a term of seven years, at an annual salary of $10,000. Their expenses are paid while traveling. Joseph E. Davies of Wisconsin is chairman of the commission, and Edward N. Hurley of Illinois is vice chairman. The functions of the trade commission are to investigate the organization, conduct and management of any corporation, joint stock company or corporate combination (except common carriers) engaged in commerce among the several states and with foreign nations and to gather such information and data as will enable the president of the United States to make recommendation to congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce.

EDWARD N. HURLEY.

Edward N. Hurley, vice chairman of the commission, is fifty-one years old and is the only member not a college graduate. He was a locomotive fireman and an engineer on the Burlington railroad and then traveling salesman. As the originator of the pneumatic tool industry in the United States and Europe he made a fortune, and, retiring from business, established a country home at Wheaton, Ill., and engaged in farming and stock breeding. When made a member of the commission he was president of the Illinois Manufacturers' association, a machine company and a national bank.

YOUNG FOLKS' CORNER

Flowers of Many Countries.

The thistle, a plant with prickly stem and leaves, is the national flower of Scotland. It was chosen because the Scotch think it saved some of them from an enemy. This is the story: A long time ago a great army marched quietly into a Scotch city one night. They thought they could easily capture the city, for all the people would be sleeping. But just as they reached the city a barefooted soldier stepped on a thistle, which stung him so badly that he cried aloud. He was heard by the Scotch soldiers, who woke the people and they saved the city.

The shamrock, a kind of clover plant, is the flower of Ireland. St. Patrick first used it in telling of the Holy Trinity. There is a superstition that snakes will not touch this plant.

The fleur-de-lis is the emblem of France, but it is not known whether this comes from the tame lily or the iris or flag lily. There are many stories about the origin of this emblem, one of them being that an angel gave it to King Clovis when he was baptized.

The chrysanthemum, the flower of Japan, decorates much of the embroidery done by these people and the chrysanthemum fete is celebrated every year in Japan.

The flower of England is the beautiful rose, the queen of all flowers, which has blooms of many colors.

Goldy's Guest.

Goldy received his name some fourteen years ago, when he was a fluffy yellow kitten. Now he is a big, handsome cat with long soft fur almost orange in color.

One day not long ago Goldy went out into the highway, found a little field mouse and brought him home in his mouth.

Goldy's mistress keeps on the floor a clean newspaper, which serves as Goldy's dining table. The feast was spread when Goldy walked in and gently placed his little mouse right in the middle of it.

Whatever may have been his motive or whatever conversation passed between him and his guest, this much is certain: Goldy settled himself comfortably on the floor at a convenient distance from his guest, winked first with one eye and then with the other and began to sing.

The little mouse was unhurt, and after recovering from his fright he began to eat the dinner. Nibbling daintily at the food, he tasted first one thing and then another.

However, with apologies Goldy's mistress carried the little mouse outdoors and gave him his liberty. So, thanks to Goldy, one little field mouse had an amazing adventure to tell his family when he reached home.—Youth's Companion.

The Spartans.

A dancer once said to a Spartan: "You cannot stand so long on one leg as I can." "Perchance not," said the Spartan; "but any goose can."

Some Spartans as they traveled met a person who told them they were most fortunate, for a gang of robbers had just left the place. "No," answered one of them, "the robbers were the fortunate ones."

A traveler, observing the respect commanded by age in Sparta, said, "Here alone it is a pleasure to grow old."

A Spartan mother presented a shield to her son going to battle, with these words, "Son, return either with this, or upon this."

Another, to a son who complained that his sword was too short, "Add a step to it."

Demaratus, king of Sparta, being asked whether he was silent through folly or wisdom, replied, "A fool cannot be silent."

Skilled In First Aid Work.

"One of the greatest benefactors of humanity in Pittsburgh" is rather a high sounding way of referring to a fourteen-year-old scout, but that is what the doctors of the Southside hospital say about Howard Evans, a member of Southside troop No. 10. Within the last few months this boy, who is recognized as a first class scout and has won medals for heroic conduct, has rendered first aid to more than 200 injured persons and afterward saw to it that they were taken to the hospital and given proper treatment.—Pittsburgh Press.

My Fairyland.

I went to Fairyland this morn.
I went before the day was born.
A dewy path I walked along,
Until I heard a fairy's song.

Beneath a giant tree I sat,
With grass and clover for a mat.
The busy bees began to hum;
They were so glad that I had come.

The meadow lark now welcomed me
From where he hopped beneath the tree.
A little squirrel just peeped out
To make his bow and hang about.

The fuzzy worm came forth to add
His greeting too; he was so glad.
The clover red began to play,
Entreating me that I should stay.

I'm glad I've found the fairylands.
The fairies real in throngs and bands
That have such power, such charm to give
And make me see and know they live.

The Scrap Book

This Was Fine Diplomacy.

Here is a story about a diplomatic negro waiter, also about two well known Kansas men, who can go by the names of Smith and Jones just to tell the yarn.

Smith and Jones look much alike and are frequently taken for each other. One day Smith was in a certain big hotel not a thousand miles from Kansas City and went into the dining room for dinner. The negro waiter busily brushed off the crumbs and said: "Why, how is you, Mr. Jones, how is you? I's glad to see you. I hasn't seen you since I waited on your table when you all used to have a little game upstaihs."

"I'm afraid you are mistaken," said Smith very quickly. "My name isn't Jones. You have the wrong man."

"Nuff said. Nuff said," smiled the negro, with much bowing and scraping. "Ah knows all right when to keep mah mouf shet. Ah knows all right, Mr. Jones."—Kansas City Journal.

Breaking the Road.

One man with the breath of a runner cries out for the untrod road.
The sledges and men are gathered, and the dogs shall carry the load.
The whips are cracked and the lashings set; forward the eager pack,
But only the one who drives them is praised when they bring him back.
Ah, forgotten shall be the heroes who answer another's call!
They are servitors, dumb if loyal, to be nothingness, one and all.
But the roads cannot be broken except through the helping hands
Of the nameless, unthanked toilers who do but their lord's commands.
—Louis Worthington Smith.

No Headdress.

A prominent New York business man, who declines the use of his name for reasons most obvious, is telling this one on his wife:

On his return from a long tour of the west this business man's wife was narrating to him the delightful times she had while he was away.

"One night I was invited to a dinner party at a smart cafe," she said, "and one of the guests was the Turkish ambassador. He was well informed on every subject and was one of the most entertaining dinner companions I ever knew."

"Did he wear a fez?" asked the husband.

"No, indeed!" she replied. "He was clean shaved."—Saturday Evening Post.

The Last Straw.

Mary Jane's master is a slightly eccentric bachelor. He has one most irritating habit. Instead of telling her what he wants done by word of mouth he leaves on his desk or on the kitchen table or anywhere else where she is likely to see it a note curtly directing her to "Dust the dining room" or "Turn out my cupboard," and so on.

The other day he bought some note paper with the usual die sunk address imprinted upon it from the stationer and ordered it to be sent home.

Mary Jane took it in, and the first thing that caught her eye was a note attached to the package. She read it open eyed.

"Well," she said, "he's asked me to do a few things in his blessed notes, but this is the limit. I won't stand it no longer!"

For the note read:

"Die-inside this package."

The Leg Was There.

A great sensation was created the other day at a station just previous to the starting of the morning express for London. The guard was about to start the train when a fussy and fat old gentleman trotted up to him and said:

"Wait a minute, will you, please, while I"—

"Impossible, sir," said the guard, putting the whistle to his lips.

"But you must wait!" cried the old gentleman excitedly. "There's a man's leg under the wheel!"

"Good gracious! Where is he?" inquired the horror stricken guard. "Hold on there!"

He hurried after the old gentleman, while a couple of porters jumped down on to the line amid great excitement. After a short search one of the porters handed up a rush basket containing a large leg of mutton.

"Thank you," said the old gentleman.

"What do you mean, sir?" roared the guard. "You said"—

"I said a man's leg was under the wheel, and so it was. I paid for this leg, and if it isn't mine I should like to know to whom it belongs."

Then the train moved on.—London Answers.

Toothsome Revenge.

During the reign of Charles II., the age of gallantry, it was the custom among gentlemen when they drank a lady's health in order that they might do her still more honor to destroy at the same time some part of their clothing.

Upon one occasion Sir Charles Sedley was dining in a tavern and had a particularly fine necktie on, whereupon one of his friends to play him a trick drank to the health of a certain lady, at the same time throwing his necktie in the fire. Of course Sir Charles had to do likewise, but he got even, for not long after that, dining with the same company, he drank the health of a fair one, at the same time ordering a dentist whom he had engaged to be present to pull out a refractory tooth which had been troubling him. Every one else was obliged in this manner to [illegible].

FOUR GOOSEBERRY VARIATIONS.

GOOSEBERRY FOOL.—Take two pints of gooseberries and stew them in as little water as possible. You don't have to have a lot of juice. When they are quite soft work them through a sieve. Make a thick custard. Let the gooseberries get nearly cold; then stir the custard thoroughly into them. When the whole thing is perfectly cold serve it in a glass dish or in little custard cups.

Gooseberries which are just "on the turn" are much more acid than those which are quite green. If you get them when they are turning add a great deal of sugar or your food will not be eatable.

Gooseberry Trifles.—Use two pounds of gooseberries and stew them with six ounces of sugar and a very little water till they are tender. Cut three sponge cakes into three or four slices. Arrange them in a glass dish. Pour the hot stewed gooseberries over them. Let the fruit cool down a little and then cover it with half a pint of thick custard. When the custard is quite cold decorate it with cherries or little bits of angelica.

Sunday Pudding.—You can use almost any fruit for this pudding, but gooseberries are nice. The ingredients are: Stewed fruit, sugar to taste, custard and thin slices of white bread. Cut the crusts off thin slices of stale white bread and line the inside of a basin. Fit them neatly into one another so that there are as few gaps as possible between them. Stew the fruit with plenty of sugar. While it is still quite hot pour it into the basin. Cover in the top with another slice of bread. Put a saucer on the top slice and a weight on the saucer to press down the contents of the basin. Let it stand a whole day, then turn it out in a glass dish and cover it with thick custard.

FINANCIAL ECONOMY.

One Man's Scheme When He Found His Capital Was Shrinking.

What one man did when he discovered his capital was shrinking is told in the American Magazine:

"A friend let me into a secret of his financial economy which strikes me as valuable. He is of middle age, with a small family, and has an income of $3,500 a year. He has put by a few thousand dollars. His investments are in gilt edged securities.

"At the end of every six months he figures out exactly the value of his property. Each share of stock, each bond is reckoned at its present market price, and the sale value of his house is placed at the lowest figure. To the current value of his estate he adds his life insurance. The result is the capital which would be available for the support of his wife and children should he suddenly die.

"At the last three reckonings my friend found that his capital was shrinking. There had been declines in certain stocks and bonds and a falling off in the value of his real estate. What did he do? Commiserate himself? Not at all. He went to a life insurance company and took out a policy large enough more than to cover the shrinkage in his capital. Comparatively speaking, it cost him very little, but it added a neat sum to the value of his estate and guaranteed an unimpaired income to his wife."

PENS OF THE PAST.

The Old Time Quill and the Art of Putting a Point on It.

Quill pens are no longer used except in rare old fashioned instances, but people still use "penknives"—you can see the name any day in the cutlery store windows—but they do not use them to make or mend pens. In fact, where is there a man or woman who knows how to put a point on a quill? It was once an art which every man had to master, though women were generally bad at it, as they are now at sharpening pencils.

In the old days the first question asked of a schoolmaster was the one whether he was skillful in pointing quills, for he had to sharpen the pens of his whole school and incidentally instruct his pupils in the art. Alas! There is no modern pen of steel or gold that is so smooth, so swift, so alluring as a good quill pen. The writer is very sure of that, for his father used to tell him so.

The art of handwriting has certainly declined since the quill pen went out of use. The old fellows could really write. We still pay them an unconscious tribute by calling a writer a "quill driver" and picturing the pen, whenever we have to make an abstract representation of it, as a quill.—New York Mail.

A Diplomatic Official.

During the reign of Emperor Napoleon III. he and the empress visited Normandy and had arranged to spend a couple of days at Evreux. M. Janvier de la Monte, who was the prefect, learned that the revolutionaries intended to hiss the sovereigns as they passed, and so he summoned the leaders of the movement and told them that he knew of their plot. "If you carry out your plan," said he to them, "you will get six months in prison. If you do not your friends will accuse you of cowardice and treason. As a way out of the difficulty I propose to lock you up at once until the emperor has gone." The conspirators accepted the terms offered them, and so the emperor was greeted only by cheers, as the revolutionaries, frightened at the arrest of their chiefs, had not dared to utter a sound.

The Tail of a Fish.

A fish's tail is its wings. Owing to the machinery of muscle set along its spine and to its cleaving form a trout or salmon can dart through the water at a tremendous pace, though its rapid flights, unlike the bird's, are not long ones. It is soon tired. The water is not so friendly to flight as the air. The stroke of the fish's tail is one of great power, and by means of it and the writhing, snakelike flexion of the body a high speed is reached. The strength behind this speed is shown in the way a fish or sea mammal out of the water will raise its tail and strike the ground or boat.

Victor Hugo.

Victor Hugo was the wealthiest of the nineteenth century authors and also the hardiest. At one time he made less than 1,000 francs last him and his brother for eighteen months, and one chop would serve for lunch three days in succession. But this early abstinence did not spoil Hugo's digestion, for at the age of eighty-three he cracked nuts with his teeth and ate oranges as some folk eat apples—peel and all.

Then the Row Started.

Mrs. Snappem (who has been suffering from toothache)—Thank goodness, I've had that tooth out at last! Mr. Snappem—Happy tooth! Mrs. Snappem—What do you mean? Mr. Snappem—It's out of the reach of your tongue.

The Grind.

"What are you doing now?"

"Two a day," said the vaudeville actor. "And you?"

"I can't quite equal that," responded the popular novelist. "Two a week is about my limit."—Kansas City Journal.

It is a great step in the interpretation of life when we have discovered that all events are ultimately spiritual.—Brierley.

AN INNOVATION IN VEST EFFECTS.

Although dark colors are in the lead for Autumn frocks, checks and plaids continue popular, and this one-piece frock is in brown and green check, trimmed with changeable taffeta.

The one-piece frock has been called the first-aid to the well-dressed woman's wardrobe, and certainly it finds a conspicuous place among the modes for Fall. Checks and small plaids continue in fashionable request for these dresses, with trimmings of plain silk and velvet to enhance their daintiness. The touch of novelty which this model boasts is achieved through the vest, which is continued down onto the skirt in a pointed section and trimmed with buttons of velvet. The front gores of the three-piece skirt are perforated to be cut away for the insertion of this pointed section, but if preferred, the front lap may be continued in a straight line to the top of the skirt, and the pointed section cut away from the vest.

In medium size the model calls for 3¼ yards 54-inch material, with ⅜ yard 40-inch silk for the collar, belt, cuffs and buttons.

The back gore is placed on the fold of material first, in cutting the dress and, contrary to usual custom, the lower edge of the gores is placed nearest the crosswise edge of the goods—that is, at the very beginning after the material has been folded in half. The front gore reverses this position and has the waist-line pointing to the left of the cutter and the lower edge to the right. The front is laid near the lengthwise fold, but not on the edge, and to the right of this is the back, followed by the collar and belt, all on the fold.

To the right of the front gore, and on a lengthwise thread is the sleeve, with the side-front coming after the sleeve.

There are not any startling changes in the lines of one-piece frocks, but there is a growing tendency to favor more fitting lines, with a slight curve at the waist-line and, of course, a greater fulness in the skirt.

Belts of suede and velvet are to figure conspicuously in the trimming of plaid frocks, regardless of the material used.

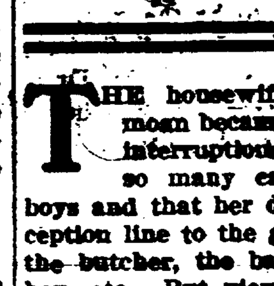
Economy Hints



A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

THE housewife makes a great moan because she has so many interruptions from tradesmen, so many calls from delivery boys and that her day is one long reception line to the grocer, the iceman, the butcher, the baker, the vegetable boy, etc. But viewing this reception line from the other end of the glasses, how about the time and trips the housewife wastes for each of these who bring her supplies? Is the delivery boy's time not worth something? Does it make no difference to the iceman if he has to stop the wagon, go round the entry and up the eight back steps for nothing?

Dealers in various lines have figured out the daily cost for their delivery service. Every call, every knock at the back door, has a definite cash value. The dealer ostensibly pays it, but ultimately it is the housewife consumer who pays it in higher prices. The more unnecessary delivery service the more the running expense of the dealer and hence less profit which he must make up somewhere else.

It is truly only the inefficient housewife who cannot master the daily tradesman situation. Phone calls demanding four or five deliveries a day indicate the sloppiest of wasteful management. Even with such itinerants as vegetable peddlers a definite understanding can be made as to the two or three special days on which they are to call. The writer lived for the winter months in a somewhat fashionable suburb. Every day at about 8:30 a. m. an order boy called from each butcher, grocer, fish and vegetable store. What a waste of good shoe leather, because certainly if we need a box of cornstarch and a bottle of olives tomorrow we can perfectly well order them today. Or if we are living in any way removed from barbarians who know not where they are going to rush out and catch their next meal we can and must plan meals ahead.

But perhaps it is a poor iceman for whom our pity surges at this season. We hesitate to think that any woman looks with envy on the economic independence of the average iceman. Starting on his rounds at 3 a. m., alternately driving a clumsy wagon and handling and carrying hundreds of pounds of frozen water until late at night, sometimes as late as 10 o'clock on summer Saturday nights—cannot the housewife assist in alleviating his lot?

How many times we permit the iceman to come all the way around only to tell him (as we take his time to look while he is there) that we do not need any ice today. The card system is gaining foothold, but it should be more universally and strictly adhered to. If we need ice let us put out the card, but do not let us waste the iceman's time and that of his team in fruitless calls at our back door.

Hot Weather Comfort.

The pores should be left as wide open as possible if you do not wish to suffer excessively from the heat. This does not mean that you should never try to stop perspiration, because if your glands excrete too rapidly you will have to take some means of reducing your condition to a normal one.

Perspiration should not be allowed to remain on the body any longer than necessary, as it is not only unpleasant, but unhealthy. During warm weather bathing can scarcely be too frequent. Tepid baths are best of all during the hot weather, for hot baths are much too heating, and cold baths stimulate the circulation to such a degree that the after effects are positively glowing.

To regulate the flow of perspiration an astringent in the bath is less harmful than applying it directly to the skin. Alcohol is, of course, cooling and refreshing, but it is very apt to produce tiny wrinkles because of its drying effect. Toilet waters are less inclined to do so, but if the skin shows any indications of dryness after using one a good cold cream must be rubbed in at once to restore the natural grease which the toilet water has absorbed.

Never apply powder till the skin is dry. Powder and moisture paste up skin pores, which should be kept open in order to excrete perfectly.

Meyerbeer and Thunder.

Meyerbeer, like Handel, composed best in a thunderstorm. He had a room made at the top of his house with glass roof and sides, so that he might enjoy these conditions to the full whenever they presented themselves. It is said that no beast of the field, no raven or nightjar, could scent the approach of a storm more unerringly than Meyerbeer, and nothing was allowed to interfere with his solitary enjoyment of it when it arrived. Wherever he was he would leave at the first premonitory rumble.

Might Be on One's Nose.

"Don't get down in the mouth, old man," said the optimist. "Look on the bright side of things."

"That's all very well," mournfully replied the sufferer, "but what is the bright side of a gumboil?"

LURING WILD GEESE.

Live Decoys Are Often Used and Made to Play the Traitor.

American wild geese each spring migrate from waters of the southern states to the shores of the Arctic in northern Canada. The two great common varieties of the bird are the honkers and the wavy, or white, goose.

Both of these are extensively hunted. Covering, as they do, about 5,000 miles on their annual migration, these birds rest at various places en route and are thus shot by sportsmen almost across the length of the continent. The birds have a peculiar trait of always leaving one of their number on lookout while the rest feed.

To aid in the shooting of wild geese live wild ones, captured young and raised in captivity, are often placed in feeding grounds in likely territory on the line of flight of the migrating flocks. These decoys are terrible traitors and by their calling often bring the flying ones within shooting distance of the sportsmen, who lie in hidden pits near at hand.

Painted decoys, shaped like geese and made of steel, are also used by the hunters. In the latter case the men, from their hiding place in the pits, call the birds by using a goose call, a metal instrument like a flute, which mimics the sound of the goose with remarkable realism.—Philadelphia North American.

WRITING ON METALS.

By the Use of Wax and Acids Etchings May Easily Be Made.

Usually a man attempts to put his name on his metal possessions by scratching with a file or knife point and makes the poorest sort of a job. It is really very easy to write on any metal—the blade of a jackknife, a watchcase, skates—if one happens to know how, and the attractiveness of the inscription is limited only by the artistic ability of the individual.

Cover the place where you wish to write with a thin coating of melted beeswax. When the wax is cold write plainly with any pointed instrument, being particular to cut the letters through the wax to the metal.

Then mix one ounce of muriatic acid and one-half of an ounce of nitric acid, or smaller quantities in the same proportions (and remember that those acids are deadly poisons), and apply the mixture to the lettering with a feather, carefully filling each letter.

Allow the acids to remain from one to ten minutes, according as the etching is to be light or deep. Next dip the article in water, wash out the acids and melt off the wax, and the thing is done. A little oil should be applied as a finishing touch. Gold, silver, iron or steel can be marked in this way.—Youth's Companion.

Berthollet and Robespierre.

It is said that the celebrated savant Berthollet in the most dangerous times of the republic sustained his fearless love of truth. Some days prior to the ninth Thermidor a sandy deposit was found in a barrel of brandy intended for the army. The contractors, suspected of poisoning, were immediately arrested, and the scaffold was already prepared. Berthollet, however, examined the brandy and reported it free from all adulteration.

"You dare maintain," said Robespierre to him, "that that brandy does not contain poison?"

As his reply Berthollet drank off a glass, saying, "I never drank so much before."

"You have plenty of courage!" exclaimed Robespierre.

"I had more when I signed my report," replied the chemist, and here the matter terminated.

Seventh Century Needlework.

Before the end of the seventh century needlework was carried to great perfection in convents, where it was used for the establishment of the church and the decoration of priestly robes. Artists did not think it beneath their dignity to trace the patterns used for embroidery in their natural colors. A certain religious lady, wishing to embroider a sacerdotal vestment, asked no less a personage than St. Dunstan, then a young man, but already noted for his artistic skill and taste, to draw the flowers and figures, which she afterward worked in gold thread.—Exchange.

Easily Arranged.

A man took the following telegram to a telegraph office: "Mrs. Brown, Center Street: I announce with grief the death of Uncle James. Come quickly to read the will. I believe we are his heirs. John Black."

The telegraph clerk, having counted the words, said, "There are two words too many, sir."

"Cut out 'with grief,'" was the reply.—Chicago News.

In These Martial Days.

"You must not be so quarrelsome, Willie," said William's father impressively. "Remember that 'the meek shall inherit the earth.'"

"Maybe they will hereafter," responded the young militant, "but around in my school they are used to wipe up the earth."—Chicago Herald.

WAR'S EFFECT ON FURS.

Paris Depending on Russia For the Fall Output.

The precious furs from nearly all over the world always went to France and found their way back to the lands that had produced them. Whether or not Paris can take care of this trade this summer remains to be seen. She has handled the clothes question with all her old time skill and not left the rest of the world in doubt concerning the silhouette or materials to be adopted, although she will not attempt to produce her usual immense personal trade for the women who have always gone to her for their clothes. This work she leaves practically to America, the only country except the Argentine where fashionable clothing is sought and bought. It may be that America will supply the Argentine, and it is rumored that several of its buyers are coming to New York to buy French models or their copies.

The nonfreedom of the seas has kept the great bulk of American travelers away from France, and there is no reason to doubt, therefore, that the women will buy all their clothes, including furs, from the American merchants who have representatives now in France going their usual two a day rounds of the dressmaking houses.

Callot and Cheruit, the two houses that always have a significant influence on American fashion, are not yet open. The latter house always defers its openings until the others have finished their business, although some of the buyers do not wait for the event. It is quite safe to assert, however, that when this is the case the buyer who leaves will receive all the Callot models he desires.

So as the huge auction sales in London are not held this year and the Paris openings are not yet over the furriers here are uncertain which way the wind will blow by October, and this may be the reason that even the most important fur houses here are selling fur garments at unusually low prices. It is a good time for the purchaser who merely wants fur, but the woman who fears being saddled with a garment that is not in keeping with the fashions will go warily about buying peltry now.

HELPFUL HINTS.

To clean varnish and paint rub with a cloth dipped in a weak solution of vinegar and warm water. Polish with a wash leather.

To clean marble rub with a slice of lemon dipped in salt. Leave for an hour, then wash off. All stains will be removed and a nice gloss secured.

Before sweeping carpets take an old round tin, pierce holes in the bottom and fill with common salt. Sprinkle this over the carpet. It prevents the dust from rising, brightens the colors and prevents moths.

When cleaning mirrors and windows sprinkle a few drops of metal polish upon a cloth and rub over the glass. Leave to dry, then polish with a clean cloth.

To remove smoke marks from ceiling mix a thick paste of starch and water and with a clean flannel spread it over the mark. Allow it to get thoroughly dry; then brush off with a soft brush and the marks will have disappeared.

Hot water marks can be removed from japanned trays by rubbing with sweet oil. When the marks have disappeared rub with dry flour and a soft cloth.

Berlin Newspaper Criticises Kaiser's Promise to Cease Undersea Attacks as Admission of Guilt or Weakness

Berlin, Sept. 6, via London.—The Vossische Zeitung devotes three columns to discussion of the situation as regards Germany and the United States under the heading, "The Agreement with America." After impliedly expressing dissatisfaction at the message conveyed by Ambassador von Bernstorff to the Washington authorities, it declares:

"Complete unanimity reigns in Germany in the wish to maintain unaltered peace between Berlin and Washington. Ambassador von Bernstorff's explanation must be taken either as an admission of any guilt in past procedures os as an indication of fear or weakness.

"It must be reiterated that the torpedoing of the Lusitiana, no matter how lamentable from a humanitarian standpoint, left no stainu pon Germany's honor. The same holds true for the Arabic. If it ever becomes possible to clear up this case through unobjectionable evidence it will be shown that the captain of the Arabic himself was guilty of his fate and that of his passengers.

"It must also be specifically pointed out that submarine warfare against merchant vessels will now as formerly—and, it is to be hoped, with unremitting vigor—be carried on. There can be no talk of any 'result' for Great Britain. British marine losses will not be lessened in the future through sordid manipulations in making use of German good nature.

"Our admissions to America have restrictions. Our agreements count only in case British passenger ships do not try to harm our submarines. If Great Britain in the futre believes it will be possible to deal lightly with the lives of American citizens, she will have to bear the consequences as before. Through our step we have proved to Americans—if it were necessary—in the most loyal way how lightly we value the relations existing between them and us. It is surely known in leading circles in the United states that even a declaration of war by America against Germany could no longer do real harm to the German cause."

"The British press is attempting to alter the case to make it appear that German's move was made with an intention to win the American President as a peace agent. We do not know hwether President Wilson has this thought. Likewise we cannot prevent the Pope, through Cardinal Gibbons, from expressing his peace desires to the President. We highly respect the humanitarian basis of this, but we do not like to leave any uncertainty concerning the fact that Germany does not even consider concluding peace through any agent whatever."

SOLVES DISEASE MYSTERY.

British Officer Finds Cause of 4,000 Year Scourge.

London.—Lieutenant Colonel Leiper of the London School of Tropical Medicine has just returned from Egypt, where he had been investigating bilharziosis, and has communicated an important discovery respecting this disease to the Royal Society of Medicine.

The disease, which has been a scourge to the Nile delta for thousands of years, has been discovered to have been the cause of death in mummies dating back to 2000 B. C.

In his report Colonel Leiper cited a village where 90 per cent of the children are infected. It has long been known that the disease was transmitted by water, but the life and history of the parasite have remained unestablished.

It has been discovered that the disease is started in a worm which lives in the human body. The eggs of this worm pass from the body into canals and pools, where they enter mollusc and there undergo certain evolutions. They emerge from the mollusc in a form enabling them to enter the human body through the skin. In this way the disease is commonly contracted while bathing and washing.

Colonel Leiper contends that the disease can be exterminated by filling the pools during the dry season.

Two-year-old Boy Got Bethlehem Shares Raffled by Orphan Asylum.

Ambridge, Pa.—During the orphans' picnic of Allegheny county, held at Kennywood, a ticket costing 10 cents and calling for a chance on ten shares of Bethlehem Steel company stock was bought in the name of Thomas McCroy, two years old, by his father, James McCroy, proprietor of the Hotel Grant here. The officials of the picnic received the stock from James Mulvihill, the Pittsburgh brewer.

A few days ago the stock certificate was sold in this city to a banker for $3,100 at the rate of $310 a share, the top notch price reached by the Bethlehem shares in their recent rapid rise. The money was placed on interest in the boy's name.

Chamberlain Received $11,780 in Aug.; Claim For Damages is Filed

The regular monthly meeting of the Common Council was held last night, with all the aldermen present except Alderman Baker. Mayor Fox appeared at the meeting after most of the routine business had been transacted.

The meeting was a short one, and included the auditing of the reports of George Washburn, City Chamberlain, and W. Lawson Woodbury, Commissioner of Charities; an appropriation for the Lee Memorial hospital; the designation of the polling places for the special election, and the receipt of a claim against the city for injuries.

The claim for injuries was filed by Mrs. Brannan of Hannibal st., who asserts that her son, while walking to his home last winter, fell and was seriously injured along the street at the west end of the lower bridge. According to one of the aldermen Mrs. Brannan will be satisfied if the city will pay the doctor's bill. The claim was referred to a committee on claims, composed of Aldermen Gardner, Foster and Sullivan.

The council appropriated the sum of $375 for the hospital, which fulfills the city's obligations in that quarter until October 1.

ORNAMENTAL LIGHT FELL; DENNIS MAXWELL, TIMES' READER, INJURED

An Oswego-bound Empire Railways local figured in two accidents yesterday afternoon in 1st st. After colliding with a hay wagon at the corner of Rochester and 1st sts., the local, running as a double-header, caused a globe from one of the string of ornamental street lights to fall upon two persons at the corner of Cayuga st., cutting one so that a doctor's services were required.

William Green, who resides on the Phoenix road, drove the wagonload of hay over the tracks just as the car left the depot. The car crashed into the back of the load with such force as to break the rear axle of the wagon and throw the entire outfit out of plumb. After a delay of several minutes, during which the wagon was dragged to the side of the street, the car proceeded towards Oswego. In passing Cayuga street the vibration set up by the passing cars caused the loosening of one of the large globes on the lamp post at the corner. Charles Bernard, an Evening Times newsboy, was waiting at the curb, while Dennis Maxwell, a boarded at the Lewis House, was reading one of his papers. When the globe fell it struck the young boy full on the head and was shattered. The broken bits were scattered over Mr. Maxwell and he received a severe cut on one of his hands. Chief Dyer, who was in the vicinity, had the man taken in a taxicab to Dr. Fox's office, where the wound was dressed. The newsboy escaped uninjured and the only convincing evidence he could present to his companions to show for the accident was a blood bespattered paper.

NO EMPTY SCHOOL SEATS

Total Registration Yesterday Was 1912---Special Teachers Plan Untiring Work in Their Departments.

The attendance on opening day in the city schools was 1,912, a decided growth in school numbers over that of any previous year. Although the parochial school takes a large number of pupils there are no vacancies in the seating capacity of the schools.

The Falley Seminary is again pressed into service. The High school with its 308 members last year suffered for lack of room, and this year with the registration on the opening day exceeding that of last year by 22 the problem of carrying on the work in that department this year with dispatch and efficiency bids fair to be unsolved.

The registration at Phillips street school yesterday was 380; Erie street, 307; State street, 300; Oak street, 227; Fourth street, 133; Rochester street, 97; Academy street, 98; Walradt st., 48.

The manual training department, under Prof. Jesse Lawton, assembled yesterday and plans for the year were discussed. The crafts classes under Miss Nancy Cook also assembled and the work planned for the coming year will be an inspiration not alone in the school circles but to the whole community. Miss Cook's department last year stood highest on record of any school in the state, outside of the New York City schools, for the scope of its work. Miss Cook has just returned from the Pratt Art School Camp in the Berkshires, where she improved upon her store of knowledge already in hand.

Miss Alla Brewster of Lake Placid, a graduate of Syracuse University, will be in charge of the drawing work years ago Miss Thompson taught drawing in connection with the craft work. Household arts applying to the interior and exterior of the home will be a part of the department work under Miss Cook.

Miss Alta Thompson, supervisor of music, will enlarge the music department work for this year. Until two yearsh ago Miss Thompson taugt drawing in conjunction with the music. Since devoting her entire attention upon the music an excellent foundation has been laid, and as a result the public will no doubt have some pleasure in store along that line.

This city has progressed with real strides, but, to keep up with other modern schools, it must progress still more. To insure true progress, a new high school is needed.

REGISTRATION COMPULSORY FOR SPECIAL ELECTION

Tuesday next has been decided upon as a special registration day for the special election of September 17, according to the notices posted by City Clerk Scudder today. At that time any one who has moved from one election district into another during the past year, or who is not registered, must register in order to vote on the Commission Government question. The registration will begin at 7 a. m. and continue until 10 o'clock at night.

CZAR'S ANNOUNCEMENT BELIEVED TO INDICATE IMPORTANT MOVEMENTS

London, Sept. 8.—The news that Emperor Nicholas had placed himself at the head of his army, which he announced in a telegram to Mr. Raymond Poinacre, President of France, and the trip made by the French commander in chief, General Joffire, to the Italian army foreshadow, it is believed in military circles here, stirring events on both the eastern and western fronts, in which the armies of all the Allies will co-operate.

It is declared that the Russians already are nearly, if not quite, holding their own against the Austrians and Germans, whose advance at most points has been brought to a stop, and in places are carrying on an active counter offensive.

Riga remains the danger point, but the fact that the Russians contiune to occupy the town after the Germans have advanced to the Dvina, southeast of Riga, leads the military writers to the conclusion that the Russians feel pretty sure of their ability to defend the river and in time push sufficiently far westward to relieve the pressure on their forces on the shores of the Gulf of Riga.

Westward of Dvinsk and Vilna the Russian offensive has now held up the Germans for more than a week, and to the military observers those two towns seem fairly safe, unless the invaders are able to bring up strong reinforcements. East and southeast of Grodno the Russians have taken up new positions across the River Stchara an dits numerous tributaries and are protecting the network of railways wrich run eastward and northward to the interior of the country.

To the southeast again, among the forests and swamps to the northeastern edge of the Pripet marshes, a great battle is in progress between the army of Prince Leopold of Bavaria and the troops of the Russian centre, the latter having elected to make a stand. Amid the Pripet marshes the German Field Marshal Mackensen is working hard for a decisive result. He reports that he has taken two Russian positions.

Still another battle is being fought for the triangle of fortifications further south, of which Rovno and Dubno remain in the hands of the Russians.

The Austrians and the Russians are facing each other across the Sereth River, in Galicia, where the fighting is continuous. The stands which the Russians are making suggest that their supply of munitions is ample. A Petrograd correspondent says the munition shortage of the Russians has been corrected and that, while the production is slow, it is incessant and growing in activity and method.

COACH O'NEILL CALLS HIS MEN

One Hundred Candidates Will Respond Monday, Many of Them Vets of Last Year's Varsity Eleven.

Syracuse, Sept. 8.—Frank J. O'Neill, head coach of the Syracuse University football team, has issued a call for the initial practice of the 1915 season to be held on Monday, Sept. 13. At that time he expects to meet more than 100 candidates for the Orange eleven. If that number is on hand the 1915 football squad will be far larger than has ever been before available, even in the best seasons here.

Coach O'Neill and the athletic managements have been in close touch with all athletes during the past few months and almost without exception the veteran of last fall's good varsity and freshman elevens will be on hand next Monday, eligible to enter the practice work.

But few men have been lost by graduation and their places will be filled by Frosh of last year and some of the men who will come out for the first time this fall. It is expected much new material will be attracted by the extraordinary schedule.

The western trip following the game here with Dartmouth, on November 30, has been a great magnet, as has been the Dartmouth game, since this is the first time one of the big six has came to Syracuse for a game.

The schedule: Sept. 25, Hobart at the Stadium; Oct. 2 Bucknell, at the Stadium; Oct. 9, Princeton at Princeton; Oct. 16, Rochester at the Stadium; Oct. 23, Brown at Providence; Oct. 30, Michigan at Ann Arbor; November 6, Mt. Union at the Stadium; Nov. 13, Colgate at the Stadium; November 20, Dartmouth at the Stadium; November 25, Montana at Missouri, Montana; December 1, Oregon "Aggiss" at Portland, Oregon.

Paving Board Recruits Check Improvements in First St.; Hasty Session

Those who oppose the plan evolved by the Board of Public Works that First st. shall be paved 38 feet wide between Rochester st. and Broadway have at last succeeded in holding up that improvement, temporarily, at least, for at a meeting of the Board of Public Works last night, convened as a Paving Board, Fred A. Gage, George E. Mason and A. W. Wiltsie, Commissioners, refused to vote in favor of a resolution proposed by Commissioner Garrett that the street paving should be ordered in accordance with the plans decided upon by the board at a meeting of August 23. Therefore, it is more than probable that the street will not be paved this year, and perhaps the 38 feet street will not be completed at all, unless the Board of Public Works appointed by the next Mayor shall be composed of three men who are in favor of a wider thoroughfare.

The meeting last night was called hastily, so hastily in fact, that only one newspaper representative and very few persons other than the men immediately concerned, were present. The Board of Public Works, with all three Commissioners present, convened first, and passed upon and ordered the payment of several bills.

A motion by Commissioner Garrett, seconded by Commissioner Wiltsie, that the board adjourn to reconvene as a Paving Board, was passed. The petition, signed by a majority of the property owners along First st., appointing Fred A. Gage and George E. Mason to represent them on the Paving Board in the improvement work, was formally presented tq President Stevenson and entered upon the minutes.

Commissioner Garrett at once introduced a motion which was seconded by Commissioner Stevenson, that the Paving Board order the improvement of Firsts t. between Rochester st. and Broadway, as designated by a resolution passed by the Board of Public Works at the meeting August 23.

"Read that resolution mentioned, please," said Commissioner Gage, and when Mr. Scudder read the resolution which called for brick paving, stone curbs and a 38-foot street, Commissioner Gage said, "You may call the roll on the resolution just introduced."

Commissioner Wiltsie, Gage and Mason voted against, and Commissioners Stevenson and Garrett for the resolution.

"Let me read you the portion of the charter that governs the action of this board in this situation, gentlemen," said Mr. Stevenson. The portion read, from section 65 of the charter, states that after the two commissioners appointed by the property owners take their seats," the Board of Public Works so constituted shall record an order for such improvement in its minutes, shall ascertain the cost thereof, and shall apportion the same upon all the real estate fronting upon said street, etc."

Mr. Stevenson laid special emphasis upon the word "shall," and when he had concluded, said, "Gentlemen, we have no alternative under the charter, which is mandatory in this situation, as you can see. Until the order for this improvement is recorded, this work cannot go ahead. You have just voted against the order—now the work is tied up."

"Does this tie it up?" asked Commissioner Wiltsie.

"A motion to adjourn is in order, gentlemen," said Mr. Stevenson. "We can't go any further than this." The meeting was adjourned without further discussion.

"That is exactly what we wanted," said Almon Bristol to Mr. Stevenson, after the meeting had adjourned, and those who oppose the work seem to be pleased at the turn affairs have taken.

Mr. Stevenson had nothing to say in regard to the work, and it is probable that nothing further will be done under present conditions. Even if the work were started next month, it is doubtful if it could be completed before winter sets in.

MOTORMAN BURNEY CUT ON FACE AND NECK; GUY WIRE CRUSHED GLASS

James Burney, a motorman on the Empire United Railways car due in Fulton at 8:57 a. m., narrowly escaped serious injury this morning when a broken guy wire suspended over the tracks shattered the glass in the vestibule and scattered the broken pieces all over him. The car Oswego-bound was crowded, the passengers being mostly men. Three women were in the car and became badly frightened when the crash came, but aside from arising to a standing position, as did all the other passengers, showed no signs of panic.

The car was approaching Baldwinsville at full speed when the motorman noticed the heavy end of the guy wire ahead. Realizing his dangerous position, he shut off power and applied the brakes, but it was too late to escape the shower of glass which caused a number of cuts on his face and neck, the cuts bleeding freely. When the conductor and several men rushed to the front end of the car they found the injured man on the floor in a dazed condition. After a short delay the motorman was able to resume his post.

Some Democratic Admission

Speaking of the Progressive party, the Albany Argus, for many years known as the Democratic Bible of New York state, says: "We should be sorry to see it dissolved." There's no doubt of it Progressive votes formed the ladder on which Democratic administrations climbed into power. While it may not have occurred to the Argus, it was the realization of this fact that led the thinking men of the Progressive party to abandon it.—Niagara Falls Gazette.

Prosperity Rushing On

Bankers on their western trip declare that the country cannot escape the wave of prosperity that is rushing on the nation, and President Law of the American Bankers' Association calls it "almost unbelievable prosperity."

Sit tight, boys and girls, and welcome its arrival. There are signs all along the line that it is here, but let no person be swept off his feet in participation of the good things that come with plenty of work and a quick market. The one who is at all times prosperous is the one who makes some provision for the lean years when the fat years are at hand.—Utica Observer.

Geneva Should Stand Still

Our neighbor, the city of Geneva, at a special election this week rejected the commission form of government by a vote of 678 to 67. The plan voted on was plan C. of the seven options allowed under the optional charter law.

Over 250 voters had signed the petition which brought the referendum before the voters, and that they failed to vote for the proposition in full strength is one of the things upon which the dispatches do not enlighten us.

Plan C. is one which in all probability would be most difficult of all seven options to haye an electorate, especially a conservative electorate, to adopt readily. It is however, the best form of commission government which the new law permits a municipality to adopt. It is the form that is recommended by the Short Ballot Association and other civic bodies. It is so radically a business proposition, however, that the united weight of all who hold public office or who hope in time to hold some petty job may be counted against it.

The most regrettable feature of the Geneva vote is that only about 750 voters expressed a choice when, from population figures there must be between 2,500 to 3,000 voters in Geneva. If there is such a condition of apathy in Geneva it is perhaps best that the community stood still. Without sufficient interest and willingness among the people for a change there would be little chance of success for such a change were it adopted.—Auburn Citizen.

DEMOCRACY'S NEST EGG

The old school bell yesterday sent out its first call of the year and hundreds of children from the "four corners" of the city responded. And as the chattering groups of boys and girls pass one there comes the echo of those lines—"The school house is the nest egg of millenial democracy." It is, indeed!

Aside from thinking of the need of the public school as an educational center purely, Charles Ferguson points to them as social centers. Little by little democracy is working to see and use its opportunity. President Wilson when governor of New Jersey recognized the true nature of its importance when he asked the legislature of that state to open the school buildings for social and public purposes on proper demand of responsible persons.

Dr. Frank Crane in writing, "Use the Schoolhouse" said: In Wisconsin any local organization of citizens that is neither partisan, sectarian, nor exclusive, can—by right of citizenship and not by grace of a school board—make social and public use of a school building. Before this can be done we shall have to grasp the idea that it is a duty of democracy to look after amusements as a means of culture and as a function of self-government, and to see that amusements have a deal to do with the morals of the people.

The school house is the one institution wherein the people realize themselves as a unit, bound together, not by sect or clan, class or creed, but simply by the supreme fact that they are all human beings.

Is it possible Fulton has not enough people who are interested or who fail to see the opportunity in this to build the true community spirit. Can enough people be found here who will stand together to foster a movement for a series of monthly or bi-monthly public programs to be given the people at the city's high school? Many villages are carrying out each programs. Why then would it not be possible in a city of 12,000 people?

Fulton needs to develop a community spirit, and the school is the logical place. It is indeed, "the nest egg of democracy."

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS
President American Society for Thrift

Nothing need be wasted. There is a use for everything. Some of the large manufacturing plants are schools of thrift from which even the business man or housekeeper might well take a lesson.

In the manufacture of silk the utilization of the waste product is quite as important as the silk itself. For every pound of raw silk taken direct from the cocoon there are left from twelve to fourteen pounds of waste. This tremendous amount of refuse, however, after being softened, dressed and combed by special machinery becomes a keen competitor of the raw silk. When mixed with wool or cotton it is manufactured into goods resembling silk.

Coal-tar was once considered one of the obnoxious waste materials. Modern enterprise and thrift is today turning this erstwhile refuse into thing ofv alue and necessity. Thus this once valueless and offensive substance is now being utilized in making such a great and varied list of products as beautiful dyes, perfume, flavoring extracts, benzine, creosote, carbolic acid and numerous drugs.

The value of waste paper is so great that the collecting of it affords a good livelihood for hundreds in every great city. Thousands ofb usiness houses throughout the country, large and small concerns alike, have found the saving of waste paper sufficiently profitable to invest money in expensive machines for pressing this paper into bundles ready for the market.

In fact, the choir boys of one of Chicago's large Episcopal churches earned the money for their annual "Camping-out" this year by collecting old papers and selling them to a paper mill. At the same time they learned a lesson in thrift.

That we are a wasteful nation and have been for many years we hear on every hand. Some years ago, natural gas was discovered in parts of Indiana. Joy was unconfined and so was gas, for it was wasted with proverbial American recklessness. Flambeaux lighted the yards at night and the gas was kept burning in stores, offices and homes all day. Remonstrances from horrified outsiders were met with a careless wave of the hand and an assurance that the supply was inexhaustible—so why take the trouble to turn it out? Later, of course, this waste was stopped, but it was an example of our tendency to waste that of which we have a bountiful supply.

Waste is so prevalent that few of us, perhaps, realize how extensive it is. Why, the old cooking utensils, broken stoves, tin cans, etc., gathered in a single year off the dumping grounds in the great American cities have a value of $14,000,000.

Let us take all these lessons home to ourselves. Are we not wasting time, money and energy every day of our lives?

Mistake of the Big Steak

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

WATCH out for waste in circulation. Find out where your story is going to be read. Don't pay for planting the seed of publicity in a spot where you are not going to harvest the results.

The manufacturer of soap who has his goods on sale from Oskaloosa to Timbuctoo doesn't care how widely a newspaper circulation is scattered Whoever reads about his product is near to some store or other where it is sold—but you have just one store.

Buying advertising circulation is very much like ordering a steak—if the waiter brings you a porterhouse twice as big as your digestion can handle, you've paid twice as much as the steak was worth to you, even if it is worth the price to the restaurant man.

You derive your profit not from the circulation that your advertisement gets, but from circulation that gets people to buy.

If two newspapers offer you their columns and one shows a distribution almost entirely within the city and in towns that rely upon your city for buying facilities, your business can digest all of its influence. If the other has as much circulation, but only one-third of it is in local territory, mere bulk cannot establish its value to you—it's another case of the big steak—you pay for more than you can digest. That part of its influence which is concentrated where men and women can't get your goods after you get their attention, is sheer waste.

By dividing the number of copies he prints into his line rate, a publisher may fallaciously demonstrate to you that his space is sold as low as that of his stronger competitors, but if half his circulation is too far away to bring buyers, his real rate is double what it seems. He is like the butcher who weighs in all the bone and sinew and fat and charges you as much for the waste as he does for the meat.

CHEAP PAINT

There are 1000 "cheap" paints and a dozen really cheap ones.

That double word "cheap" is the cause of wasting more money than good paint costs, two or three times over.

Cheap paint is good paint; there is no other; no other is cheap.

The two words sound alike but their meanings are opposite. "Cheap" cost double. Cheap is Devoe.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

REMARKABLE REFRIGERATOR RECORD

On the first morning of the County Fair we put a 25c piece of ice in one of our White Mountain Refrigerators over on the fair grounds. Said refrigerator stood during the four days of the fair, within six feet of the Andes coal range, which baked the hundreds of biscuits given away during the fair. When the refrigerator was moved back to our store at the close of the fair, we took out and threw away a piece of ice nearly as large as a peck measure, what was left of the original piece and after cooling the contents of the refrigerator for four days. Surely a remarkable record. What refrigerator but a White Mountain could do as much?

Rather than carry over the several we have left, we will cut the price just $10 each from original price.

NEARLY 1 TON OF POULTRY SOLD

That Was Saturday's Record at Auburn's Public Market --Sales Numbered 4780; Producers, 81.

The Auburn Citizen reports the growing popularity of Auburn's public market which on Saturday recorded the biggest sales as well as the largest number of producers in the market's history.

Sales in all lines were brisk and a total of 4,780 were recorded before the last of the 81 producers had left. The largest number of producers on hand on any previous days was 52.

Poultry sold rapidly at 18 and 20 cents dressed and 14, 15 and 16 alive. Butter was scarce at 26 and 27 cents but eggs went well at 26.27 and 28.

Celery sold briskly at five cent a bunch. Corn was snatched up at 8, 10 and 12 cents a dozen ears, and tomatoes sold heavily at five cents a quart and 70 cents a bushel. A total of 2,480 quarts were disposed of.

Transactions in apples were brisk at 50, 55 and 60 cents and the sales of pears were gratifying at 50, 60 and 75 cents. Squash was cleared away at 5 cents each and two for five. Cucumbers went at one cent each for large ones and 30 and 35 cents a hundred for pickling.

A small amount of honey was sold at 15 cents a pound. One woman purchaser gave a producer her address with the request that he deliver an order of tomatoes and corn to her home.

Labor Union Active

President John H. Rahrle of the Central Labor Union appointed a committee consisting of Thomas Mohan chairman, Bert Baker and William J. Nugent to present to the Common Council a resolution urging the city to provide a place of the coming months. This resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Central body.

The resolution as adopted was not given out as the officers said that the committee members had been empowered to amend it if they saw fit and did not wish to have it appear until completed. It is known that the text of the resolution urges the Council to purchase some permanent site for the Public Market which has proven so successful. The resolution also favored the establishment of public scales at the market.

According to the labor leaders this is the last month of the trial market and they realize that the Council must act quickly so that it may continue through the winter months. In discussing the resolution many of the members pointed out that the market gardeners had considerable produce to sell in the winter, and it was also declared that they might be encouraged to raise vegetables which are only grown in the South during the cold months. This would mean a saving to Auburnians as the southern vegetables command fabulous prices.

MISS COLLINS BECAME BRIDE IN SYRACUSE

Miss Genevieve M. Collins, who for the past six years has been stenographer at the Victoria Mills, yesterday became the bride of William E. Burns of Syracuse.

Mrs. Burns had previously made her home with her grandmother, Mrs. Thomas Collins, Hannibal street, this city.

Mr. Burns is president of the Engineers and Firemen's Brotherhood in Syracuse and is an engineer on the New York Central.

The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. D. J. Dooling at St. Lucy's church at 7 o'clock yesterday morning. The couple were attended by Francis M. Lynch and Miss Frances Burns of Syracuse.

A wedding breakfast was served at the Onondaga after which Mr. and Mrs. Burns left for the Pacific coast. Upon their return they will make their home at 125 Durston street, Syracuse.

KING'S DAUGHTERS GIVE FINE ENTERTAINMENT

The first meeting of the King's Daughters of the Baptist church was held yesterday afternoon at the home of Mrs. N. H. Haviland. The program was in charge of Mrs. Mortimer Rust and was musically fine, consisting of readings by Mrs. Pratt and Mrs. Hubbard and the Misses Osgood. Musical numbers given by Mrs. Edna Raaflaub of Syracuse, Mr. F. Jess Newton, Byron Newton, Mr. Rust and Dr. and Mrs. Haviland.

Two new dances have been introduced at the dancing resorts at Salt Lake City, Utah, and they are said to very popular.

FREE TREATMENT FOR THE POOR

Dr. C. L. Fessenden, who has just taken up his residence in this city, with offices at 201 South First st., has announced an innovation already much in vogue in western cities—free treatment for worthy poor.

Dr. Fassenden said last night, "During my practice in Syracuse and Sioux Falls, South Dakota, I have always given over one afternoon a week to the treatment of deserving poor people who were not financially able to engage a physician, and who hesitated to ask help of the authorities. I shall continue that custom in this city. Commencing next Thursday afternoon and continuing as long as I remain here, I shall treat poor patients free of charge. I wish it understood, however, that none but the deserving poor will be given treatment. By that I do not mean that I will investigate the circumstances of each patient, but anyone who attempts to wrongfully take advantage of this offer will soon be discovered."

Dr. Fessenden graduated from the Syracuse University in 1910. Since that time he has practiced medicine in Syracuse and in South Dakota.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom—Special Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze,

Albany, Sept. 8.—Two amendments to the Constitution adopted by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention which are of importance are those which deal with the sale of highway bonds and changes in the Judiciary article, respectively.

The former amendment provides: "The moneys authorized to be raised by the sale of highway bonds, pursuant to the law approved by vote of the people at the general election held in the year 1912, which have been apportioned to certain counties in excess of the sums, to be determined by the Comptroller, which are or will be required to construct and improve the highways theretofore determined by general laws to be constructed and improved in said counties, shall be applied by the State commission of highways after appropriation by the legislature to the construction and improvement of such State routes and portions thereof, as were defined by law when said bonds were authorized, and located outside ofs aid counties, as it may deem expedient."

In the judiciary article numerous changes are made. The members of the Court of Appeals are increased from eight to ten; the legislature is to act upon the report of the board of Statutory Consolidation and to enact and adopt a simplified act on civil commissioners are to be appointed to determine the compensation to be paid whenever private property is taken for public use.

Appeals may be taken to the Court of Appeals in certain cases under the proposed order of things as follows: where the judgment is death, from a judgment of the Appellate Division where the construction of the Constitution of the United States is involved from an order of an Appellate Division of the Supreme court granting a new trial where the appellant stipulates that upon affirmance, judgment absolute shall be rendered against him; in any case where a question of law is involved.

Other changes give to the Court of Appeals the right to determine the qualifications and prescribe the rules regulating the admission to practice of attorneys in the courts of the State; the legislature is authorized to consolidate the offices of county judge and surrogate in any county; children courts and courts ofd omestic relations are authorized and may be established by the legislature also.

On the trial of an impeachment against the governor or the lieutenant governor, neither the lieutenant-governor nor the temporary president of the senate shall act as a member of the court. The court for the trial of impeachments may order all or any part of the testimony to be taken and reported by a committee composed of members of the court, except that the impeached officer must be allowed to testify before the court if he so desire.

The court of general sessions in New York is dealt with to considerable length. After January first, 1917, it is to have jurisdiction and powers throughout the city of New York under the name of the Court of General Sessions of the City of New York, as it now possesses within the county of New York.

On appeals from the judgment of convictioni n criminal cases, the Appellate Division or the appellate term, may reduce the sentence imposed by the trial court or judge. There are many other changes, some technical in nature.

WEATHER FAVORS LETTUCE BEDS

Twenty-five members of the Fulton Vegetable Growers' Association met last night in Grange Hall for the purpose of talking over the produce question and hearing reports from all the nearby vegetable districts. President Day of the association, presided, and several members gave short addresses dealing with the questions of culture and shipping.

Reports from shippers read last night show that yesterday lettuce reached the high water mark of its career in this section, and one grower sold 200 small crates yesterday at $1.25 a crate, which means a price of $2.50 for the regulation crate. During the past few days, largely because of the damp, warm weather, the lettuce in this section has been growing with phenomenal rapidity and the growers predict even higher prices within the next two weeks.

Three hundred thousand lettuce crates will be ordered for this section next year, if the plans of the association materialize as several farmers in this section are going to specialize in lettuce growing next season.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?]

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

Arkansaw Bill

How His Elimination Was Accomplished

By WILLARD BLAKEMAN

Away back in the fifties when the town of Deadshot began to think of taking on the hue of civilization the question was how to make a beginning. Men had gone elsewhere for wives, who had consented to marry them and go to Deadshot without being aware of what kind of place it was. Families had sprung up about these couples, and it is generally conceded that a place containing women and children requires different management from one in which there are only men and the only law is gun law. Nevertheless the shooting went on, and in time there were a number of women left widows and children made fatherless.

For some time there was talk of stopping the gun play, but nothing was done till three little children, whose mother had died a natural death, were deprived of their father by an unnatural one. This came home to the citizens of Deadshot, inasmuch as they felt obliged to provide for the children. The grumblings were loud and long, and the desire to stop the gun play received a new impetus. A knot of men were standing on the only street in the town discussing the matter when Andrew Hunker, grinding his quid with a pair of jimber jaws, said:

"Gents, so long as we was all men together the gun was a first rate article for our differences, bein' much more effective and less expensive than by a court of law. But with wimmen and children among us it's different. It's onjust that a woman should be deprived of her husband and his support because he's suspected of holdin' two aces o' clubs when there's only one in a regulation pack. And when a a widower with children is put out o' business the care of his children falls on the town.

"Now, I reccymend that we have an orphan asylum in Deadshot, to be paid for by them as gits the better of sich as differs with 'em. Supposin' we start a fund for the purpose in this way: Any man as bores a hole in another in Deadshot pays a thousand dollars for the privilege. When the fust thousand turns up we'll begin the buildin' o' the asylum, and every thousand comin' in after that goes to carryin' on the good work."

"That's all very well," remarked Cy Atkins, "but who's goin' to levy on the man that bores the hole?"

Mr. Hunker ground his quid a trifle harder and slower and continued:

"I take it for granted that the sentiment o' this yere town has turned agin hole borin', particularly in the bodies of fathers of kids. I offer myself as one to enforce the penalty, and I haven't any doubt that I kin git all the assistance I need."

This clinched the argument, and the same evening a copy of the decree, signed by a self constituted committee, was posted throughout the town. Mr. Hunker's name, written in a style to remind one of John Hancock's on the Declaration of American Independence, led the rest, and those who were disposed to sneer at the document, on seeing his signature, desisted. The women approved, seeing in the edict a promise of being able to keep their husbands.

For several days after the posting of the notice the town of Deadshot was like the 5th of July. Not a pistol cracked. Some of the men were seen going about without their revolvers at their hips, indicating that they would rather get shot than be held for the thousand dollar penalty. But by and by the notices, moistened by the rain, did not look so formidable, and there were signs that they were forgotten or at least had lost their terror.

One morning two shots in quick succession rang out in a cabin where two men were playing cards. A third shot followed a few seconds later. The signers of the edict gathered at the scene of controversy and found Ben Rogers on the floor stone dead with two bullet holes in him. Jim Murphy was unhurt.

Mr. Hunker stepped up to Murphy and demanded his arms. Murphy, who still held his revolver, looked inquiringly into his face, then at six men backing him, all having cocked weapons in their hands, and surrendered.

The body being examined, it was found to contain two holes. The committee, after due consideration, decided that Murphy must pay $1,000 a hole.

The decision staggered the citizens of Deadshot. Some declared that Murphy, having fired in self defense, was not liable to the fine. Others declared that $2,000 for two holes, especially when one would have killed the man receiving it, was exorbitant. The committee gave out that the price of boring holes in human flesh was rising and they were thinking of making it 50 per cent higher. They had nothing to do with any other consideration than enforcing the payment due from hole borers at so much a hole.

Murphy was a gambler, and, since he never played to lose, he had plenty of funds with which to pay his fine. He added $500 as a voluntary subscription, making the nest egg for the orphan asylum $2,500. A hundred dollars was expended for a lot and material was bought for the building.

After this more men left their guns at home, and Deadshot was showing signs of much peacefulness when a new element of trouble came into the town in the person of a man from the south whose real name was not known, but who passed as Arkansaw Bill. He gave evidence of being a desperado. He knew nothing of the firmness of the committee in carrying out the edict against hole boring, and he held a law against gun play in contempt. He announced that any man who was disposed to interfere with him would get holed, and since hole boring was a right he did not intend to pay for exercising it.

Arkansaw Bill at once proceeded to make a nuisance of himself. He insisted on being admitted to games of chance, cheated and when taken to task instead of shooting his accuser invited him to put a hole in him. Bill was doubtless ready to defend himself. What he wanted was to take advantage of his enemy's indisposition to pay $1,000 for shooting him to put the orphan asylum edict into disrepute. He insulted the women, choosing those who had no men whose duty it was to protect them.

It is very hard to make a law that will not on occasion work disadvantageously. Any man attempting to put Arkansaw Bill out of the way must pay $1,000 for the privilege, and for every additional hole that was necessary to do the job he must pay an additional thousand. And this was not the worst of it. Arkansaw Bill was known to be a marvelously quick shot, and any man tackling him was likely to get holed instead of holing him.

A meeting of the committee was called to decide upon some way of getting rid of Arkansaw Bill. It was moved that in case any one put a hole in him the fine should be remitted. The motion was carried, but since any one bent on putting a hole in the desperado was liable to get a hole in himself the remission of the fine did not especially improve matters. No one seemed inclined to tackle him. Andrew Hunker proposed a simultaneous attack upon the enemy, agreeing to fire the first shot. But his proposition did not meet with favor; one or more lives of good citizens were liable to be paid for that of a villain. It was considered advisable that some stratagem should be devised by which he could be eliminated without fine.

In the first place no one was sufficiently inventive to produce such a stratagem, and in the second the consensus of opinion was in favor of a fair fight even if it was desirable to eliminate one of the combatants. It was finally proposed by Mr. Hunker that each man tackle Arkansaw Bill until some one of them downed him. This proposition meeting with favor, Mr. Hunker offered himself as the first victim. It is to the credit of the others that they declined to accept his offer, averring that lots should be drawn to determine who should be first, second, third, and so on till the six members of the committee each had a place in the proceedings.

Six numbers were written on as many bits of paper, from one to six inclusive, and placed in a hat. Then the men successively put a hand in the hat and drew a number. He who drew No. 1 was Abe Billings, a man with a wife and four children. Hunker begged to be permitted to change numbers with him, but Billings would not consent, and the meeting, each man having promised secrecy, broke up. Billings was to choose his own time for doing the job and was not required to give any notice to any one. In case he was killed in the attempt he was to make, the man who had drawn No. 2 was to make another, and so on till Arkansaw Bill or the six men should be eliminated.

Twenty-four hours passed, and both Abe and Bill still lived. During the second night after the lots had been drawn several shots in quick succession were heard coming from the direction of the quarters occupied by the desperado. Every man of the committee believed that Bill or Abe—perhaps both—had bitten the dust. Every one of them got out of bed and hurried to the scene of the fray. Abe's cabin was lighted. His children were running about in their nightgowns, but neither their father nor mother was visible.

One by one the committee as it passed Abe's quarters asked the children what had happened, but getting no coherent response hurried on toward Arkansaw Bill's cabin. They met Mrs. Billings coming away. Asked what had occasioned the firing, for reply she turned and led them to Bill's house. There in the doorway lay a body. Some one struck a match, held it to the dead man's face and lighted up Bill's ashen features.

"Who did it?" asked Hunken.

"I did it," replied Mrs. Billings calmly. "I called him to the door and shot him."

"Where's Abe?"

Again for reply she turned and led them this time to her own home. Going to a door that opened to the cellar she unlocked it and Abe came forth as much wonder stricken as the others.

"What have you been up to?" he asked his wife angrily.

"I've saved you from being murdered."

Then all saw that she had rid the place of its incubus without danger to herself or any one else. Each and every man grasped her hand and exonerated her from blame.

The orphan asylum was never built, for it was not needed. The lot and the material that had been purchased were used for a church, which helped amazingly in the civilization of the town. Deadshot has long since become one of the most thriving and cultured cities in the west. It is no longer called Deadshot. The name has been changed in honor of the woman who rendered the orphan asylum unnecessary.

The Elevator Boy

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

Many a young doctor or lawyer just starting his career has watched an elevator boy at work and said to himself:

"Ah, what a profession! No disappointments—no carking care—no burdens on the young back. Why didn't I adopt it?"

And yet the young gentleman who elevates the elevator has hidden sorrows that the public wots not of.

These sorrows begin with the engineer.

In a certain building not long ago I sized up the engineer the very first day as a man who would make me trouble if he could. I learned that two of the window cleaners thought him a single man and both were a little gone on him. Also that his wife brought his lunch in regularly every noon. The next day at the proper time I scooted up to the eighth floor and found the Widow McCarthy wiping up the hall, and I said to her:

"Have you got your lunch with you, Mrs. McCarthy?"

"Indade and I have," she replied.

"And why don't you go down to the basement and eat it in company with Engineer Flyn? I know he would appreciate your company."

"That's true, me boy, and I'll get me basket and go down, especially as that cold faced grass widdy who calls herself Mrs. O'Shane, though she's no right to it in the law, seems to have finished her floor and gone home."

I took her down and then scooted for the fifth floor and found Mrs. O'Shane and said to her:

"Why don't you take your lunch basket and go down and keep Mr. Flyn company?"

"Is it company he sighs for, me laddy? If so I'll go down and cheer him up with my presence," she replied.

"And you'll find a place to warm up some cold tea if you want to."

"Thank ye, but that is a beautiful idea, and mebbe the good hearted man will have a cup wid me. How long ago did Mrs. McCarthy disappear, Sammis?"

"Oh, I took her down some time ago."

"She calls herself the Widdy McCarty, Sammis, leavin' the 'h' out to put in her 'shugar,' I suppose, but is she a widdy, me boy? It's easy enough to say this and that, but where are the proofs? Has she ever shown anybody her husband's death notice as 'twas printed?"

"I never saw it, ma'am."

I dropped Mrs. O'Shane at the basement just as Mr. Flyn's wife came in with his lunch. There wasn't much said. The three women pitched into each other almost on sight, and they were pulling hair and banging into partitions and making the dust fly when I took a walk. Next day as I stopped at the sixth Mrs. McCarthy got sight of me and said:

"Sammis, I'm told that ye are an orphan boy all by yourself."

"Not strictly an orphan, only fatherless."

"So you've got a mother, have ye? Well, a poor fatherless boy can't be havin' too many mothers, and I'll also be a mother to ye."

"I hadn't better call you 'ma' when any one's around, had I, ma?"

"I was a-thinkin' about that, Sammis," she thoughtfully replied.

"No, I guess you hadn't. You see, it might lead to jealousy and more. Sammis, d'ye mind I went down to the basement to eat me lunch wid that spalpeen of an engineer the other day?"

"Seems as if I did. You thought Mr. Flyn would be a bit lonely, I believe. He didn't like to eat his lunch alone."

"Bad cess to his loneliness and his whole body! Sammis, me son, the man is a deceiver and ought to be dropped from the roof. He let on to me that he was a single man and dyin' fur some one to luv him. What d'ye think, Sammis? On the day I'm thinkin' of I had scarcely got out of the elevator and says 'good day' to him when she that calls herself Mrs. O'Shane cums after me, and right on her heels cums a woman wid a lunch basket—the engineer's own true and legal woife! Wasn't that a pretty mess, me son?"

"Did anything happen?"

"I'm not clear about it, Sammis, but I think somethin' did. I have a dim recollection of bein' banged on the chin, receivin' this blackness under me eye and of me heels flyin' away wid me and me bein' banged against the partitions, but I shall never be able to make it out to me satisfaction. All I'm sure of is that me head has been achin' ever since that hour, and every time I draw a breath I feel like hittin' that engineer over the head with me bucket."

"And we'll put up a job on him and get him bounced?"

"By and by, perhaps, but not now. We'll move slowly in this matter, Sammis, and meanwhile I'm lookin' for you to defend yer adopted mother's reputation should any gossip arise. Ye might deny that ye took me down that day. By the way, how's the mortgage on the home, Sammis?"

"I'm staggering under it yet, thank you."

"It's too bad, but keep up your courage. Here's a banniny to stay yer stummick till lunch time, and it's not the last ye'll git by a jugful. Quiet is the word, Sammis—easy and quiet and no gossip—and ye'll bless the day that Mrs. McCarthy adopted ye for her very own."

Mr. Flyn may think he's up to a dodge or two, but so is SAMMIS.

The Elevator Boy.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

HOMEMADE DRINKS.

GRAPE PUNCH.—Take one pint of grape juice and juice of six lemons, one pound granulated sugar and two quarts of water; mix and serve from a punch bowl. An orange or pineapple may be sliced in if desired.

Gooseberry Wine. — A recipe for gooseberry wine having been requested, the following is suggested:

Take dead ripe gooseberries, wash and drain and mash as for any other wine. Add their own bulk of boiling water and let stand for twenty-four hours, or even twelve hours longer if the weather is cool. Press out all the juice, and this means all of it, whatever the appearance may be. Measure and to each gallon add three pounds of white sugar. Stir well every day for a week, then cover with cheesecloth and let stand until fermentation ceases. Then cover tight and let stand for six weeks and strain, filtering the sediment through several thicknesses of cheesecloth.

Pineapple Lemonade.—Boil one pound of granulated sugar in a pint of water until it is a thick sirup. Squeeze the juice of three lemons in a bowl and peel a pineapple, cutting out all the eyes. Then grate the pineapple into the lemon juice, pouring in the sugar sirup after this and stirring briskly for about three minutes. Add a quart of fresh water and strain into a glass pitcher, putting in a lump of ice when serving.

Mixed Fruit Drink.—The more varieties of fruit used in this the better the drink. Cut up the following fruits in small bits and cover them for three hours with plenty of sugar: Pineapples, oranges, lemons (also peel of these), grapefruit, one or two large apples and some juicy pears. When ready to serve cover the fruit with distilled or mineral water, add maraschino cherries, a few softened figs, several slices of preserved citron and some big sprigs of fresh mint. Put in cracked ice and serve the drink in big glass pitcher, so that the pretty effect of the fruit can be seen.

Cold Tea.—Cold tea can be made the foundation of many delicious hot day beverages. Mixed with an equal quantity of ordinary lemonade the result is refreshing. Orange juice combines well with tea too. Any odd bits of jelly that are in the refrigerator can be melted and added to it, with lemon juice to counteract undue sweetness. The addition of fruit juice of any sort with cold vichy water or apollinaris or imported ginger ale makes of plain cold tea a very tempting drink.

HOW THE HOUSEWIFE MAY SAVE ON HER GAS BILL.

The average housewife spends four times the amount of gas for cooking a meal than is necessary and at the same time positively injures food values and quality of the article she is cooking. To get the greatest amount of heat units from a gas range the flame should not be turned any higher than will give a perfect blue flame. When the flame becomes a yellowish red you are wasting gas and getting a heat that not only smokes and smudges your kitchen utensils, but decreases their longevity to one-half.

The flame should be about one-half inch of clear blue, and after the article you are cooking has come to a boiling point reduce it to a point that will just keep it boiling. This is equally true in the oven. Invariably the gas is turned too high for baking and the bread or cake is burned. This also means waste of gas and a constant anxiety about the oven, which would not be necessary if gas were used at a lower temperature.

HOUSECLEANING HINT.

How the Modern Housewife Has Revolutionized Her Methods.

Modern methods have at last revolutionized housecleaning. As quickly as closets are cleaned and blankets laundered the vacuum cleaner wagon drives up to the door, the dust and air hose are rushed through convenient windows, and the fray is on.

Every speck of dust is literally sucked from the house. All upholstery to the last button receives attention. Draperies, curtains, rugs and mattresses are gone over, and pillows after being cleaned seem double their usual size and are as light and fluffy as when they were new.

This whirlwind cleaning takes but a few hours and is conducted by competent men, whose business it is. They rapidly detach and attach the various hose nozzles for different branches of the work. While this is going on windows are being washed, brasses polished, bric-a-brac is being cleaned, floor polished, and as fast as a room is finished it is set to rights. In a wonderfully short time it is all over and at a surprisingly small cost.

By dinner time everything has assumed its normal appearance minus the pile of dust and dirt the men have carried away in their wagon. And the man of the house has not only escaped all discomfort, but in most cases does not realize that anything has happened during his absence. Our grandmothers might look with suspicion on this kind of housecleaning, doubting its thoroughness, but we know that from every point of view it is far more thorough and sanitary than their more laborious methods.

One secret of this present day housecleaning is the general use of rugs in place of the old fashioned heavy carpets and the daily use of modern cleaning appliances. These special wall brushes, stair brushes, dustless dusters that polish as they go, dustless mops, waxed floor polishers and the improvements in all branches of housework keep the home always clean.

The pantries and kitchen receive their weekly cleaning much as in the olden days. Here, perhaps, science has done less to reduce labor than in other parts of the house, for as long as we use dishes they must be washed, silver must be polished and glassware cleaned carefully and perfectly. And until fashion supplies and encourages the use of table fittings that may be destroyed after each meal the dishpan must be reckoned with in the round of each day's duties.

The housekeeper who would keep up to date should make a tour frequently of the large household shops or departments in the larger stores and get acquainted with the many conveniences offered for her consideration. She should acquire the time saving devices that make for efficiency in the kitchen, just as a man seeks for efficient office and shop devices.

How to Use Burlap Upon Your Walls Artistically.

One advantage of a good burlap is that it can stay on the wall for years before painted a new color when one desires. In a house where walls are uneven or cracked this is an admirable treatment, as its roughness hides the defect. Where a hall is dingy it can be freshened by two coats of water color wash.

A favorite paper for dining room or library where there is a high wainscoting or plate rail two-thirds up the wall is a scenic frieze put on the upper third. Wonderful color effects are shown in these papers, which are cool northern landscapes and again tropical scenes.

How to Prevent Food From Scorching.

If your vegetables or preserves scorch while cooking, advises cook, remove the vessel instantly from the range and set it in a pan of cold water, letting it remain there for ten or fifteen minutes. At the end of that time you will find that the scorched taste has all vanished from the food.

When cooking cabbage, turnips or onions boil at the same time some vinegar with few spices. This will destroy all vegetable odor.

When boiling a ham leave it in the water in which it has been boiled until it is quite cold. This will make it juicy and tender.

FROCK OF SUBMARINE CHIFFON POPLIN.

A very chic costume of youthful design, fashioned of submarine blue chiffon poplin and worn with adjustable collar and cuffs of organdy.

Despite their long run, poplins are meeting with general approval for Autumn wear and will continue their popularity until some substitute is provided. They are to be had in both dress and suiting weights and are shown in the newest colors, one of the favorites being submarine—a rich, dark grayish-blue. The frock shown here finds eloquent expression in chiffon poplin, which is very serviceable despite its lustrous finish. The bodice is trimmed with collar and cuffs of natural color organdy, and the two-piece skirt has inserted side sections forming pockets.

Chiffon poplin ranges in width from 36 to 40 inches and about 4½ yards will be required for this dress if duplicated in medium size. In addition ⅝ yard of organdy will be needed for the collar and cuffs, and ⅞ yard 2-inch belting for the stay.

The dress can be cut very economically if the various sections of the pattern are advantageously placed on the poplin. First the material should be folded in half; then, placed into position first is the back gore, right on the lengthwise fold of the goods. Following this is the collar, and after the collar the front gore.

Retracing slightly, the space between the back and front gores is filled with other sections of the pattern—namely, the piecing for the back gore and the belt, the former laid on a lengthwise thread of the material and the latter along the selvage edge. So far there is practically no surplus material. Now, skipping to the lower edge of the front gore, the front of the waist is laid on the poplin, to the right. Opposite the back is the inserted side section that forms the pocket, and following this, as closely together as they can be placed, are the cuff and sleeve.

All is now ready for the cutting, and when the dress is completed one has a design admirably adapted to girlish figures.

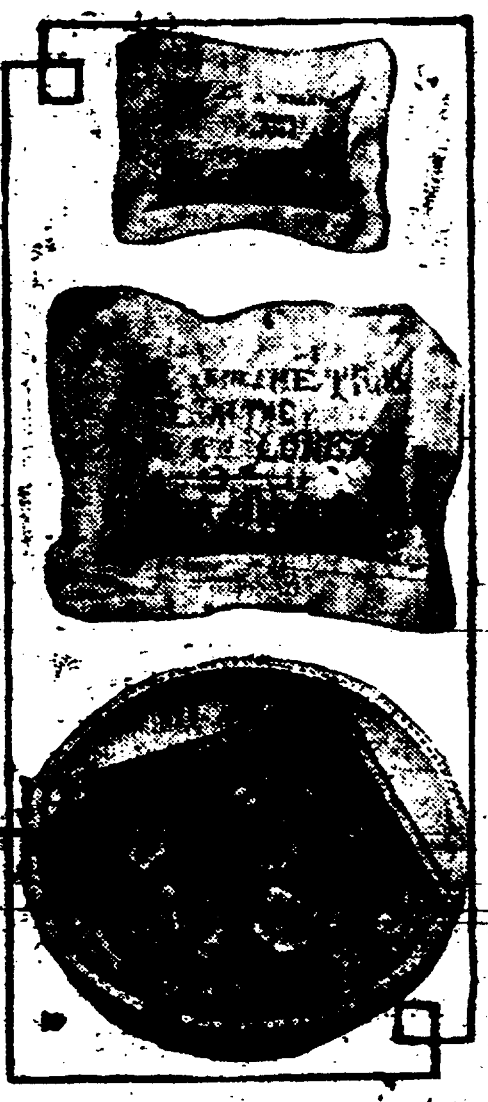
SUMMER NOVELTIES.

Hit "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" With These Bags.

Pine needle bags are a splendid reminder when autumn and winter come of the healthful days spent in the mountains where the pines rear their towering heads to the skies.



TWO PINE BAGS AND A ROSE LEAF BAG.

These bags and also the bag of rose leaves pictured are splendid in their medicinal effect upon the tired nerves of the dweller in towns. These pine bags are hand embroidered, and the rose leaf bag has an appropriate covering of rose figured cretonne.

To Clean Feather Pillows.

Open one corner of the ticking cover and pour boiling water in. This renders the feathers a kind of pulpy wet mass, which can be easily handled. Take them out and wash in soap and water thoroughly. Put back into the washed cover and hang out in the hot sun, where the feathers will swell to fill the cover and be wonderfully light and perfectly clean without having been scattered at all, as is bound to happen when dry.

A Thorough Job.

"Mah wife sar'd me to refawm me, sah," stated Brother Hilsondigger, "and I'm so' plumb bodaciously refawmed dat I wouldn't marry ag'in if I done lived to be as old as Methooselum!"—Judge.

PRIEST SCORNS $12,000,000.

Fears Burden of Wealth and Renounces Great Legacies.

The Rev. William Graham of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church, Pittsburgh, has refused to accept legacies left him by relatives in Sydney, Australia, and Bolivia, South America, exceeding $12,000,000. The priest, who is sixty years old, says that he is too old to be burdened with such wealth, and that he has enough of this world's goods, anyway.

"It may seem strange," Father Graham said, "that I should do this, but I will sleep better when I know the solicitors have taken my refusal seriously and finally, and cease to consider me in the distribution of the wealth. I have long known that uncles of mine named Murphy and Hughes lived in Australia, and that they were possessed of vast landed estates and immense herds of cattle, sheep and horses, and that I was the nearest kin; also that I had several stepuncles named Graham in Bolivia who were said to be immensely wealthy and childless. But I never knew any of them personally, and, in fact, never communicated with them in any manner. Why then, even were I disposed to pile up this world's goods, should I accept any of the inheritance they have left?"

WINS SUIT FOR SIX CENTS.

Amount Was Awarded in Slander Case, and Plaintiff Had to Sue to Collect.

Attorney Frank R. Martin sued John H. Kane for 6 cents in Detroit and won. The fact that the costs and time involved in the case amounted to several hundred times the 6 cents did not detract from the joy of the victory.

Martin sighed with satisfaction as he jingled the six pennies which Kane took from his pocket with great reluctance.

Several months ago Martin was retained by Kane's wife to represent her in a suit for divorce against her husband. Some time later Kane, among other divers things, said to Martin: "You are a cur; you have ruined my home."

Martin started suit for slander and the jury awarded him 6 cents. Kane refused to pay. Martin then started justice court action and the verdict was in his favor.

HOARDING WEALTH.

Could I climb to the highest place in Athens I would lift my voice and proclaim: Fellow citizens, why do ye turn and scrape every stone to gather wealth and take so little care of your children, to whom one day you must relinquish it all?—Socrates.

HOW TO USE SOME DELIGHTFUL AND HEALTHFUL BEAUTY RECIPES.

Here is a mixture for bath bags which is truly delightful: Four pounds of fine oatmeal, two quarts of clean bran, one and a half pounds of powdered orris root, one and a half pounds of almond meal, one pound of white castile soap, powdered and dried, and three ounces of primrose sachet.

Instead of placing in cheesecloth bags, which is a wasteful way of using the delightful meal, sprinkle a little of the mixture on the moistened wash cloth.

Here is a bath for the emaciated which was a favorite with the ancients: Mix one tablespoonful of lavender water with several times the amount of pure olive oil. Apply a little at a time and rub it well into the body with the entire hand, using a rotary motion. Keep the body warm while taking the treatment.

TABLE LINENS.

How to Keep Up With the Styles in Household Linens.

No matter how great a pride the matron takes in her rugs and pictures, her eggshell china and cut glass or the shimmering glory of her silver, if she is a real housewife the corner of the home that lies closest to her heart is her linen closet. Here, amid the faint fragrance of dried rose leaves or lavender, are stored the fine tablecloths, the napkins, the extra towels and hemstitched sheets and, in fact, all the linens which her fingers have worked upon—clean and fresh and fragrant, a monument to her good housekeeping.

It is this pride of the home maker that makes the question of linens so important a one. Fashions change in these as well as in gowns, but so slightly that the linens of our grandmothers would be equally useful and in style today. In fact, in many instances the fine heavy linens are kept from one generation to the next.

The prevalence of round tables nowadays is bringing to the fore some very handsome tablecloths with a round design in the center and a deep border, and these entire tablecloths are far more in vogue than the kind that are bought by the yard and not much more expensive. Napkins may be bought to match, the fine dinner ones being, if possible, larger than ever, and the housewife who takes pride in her linen cannot do better than choose those which are nearly a yard square. For luncheon there come, of course, smaller sizes, and all are marked in one corner with the initial in white, since colors are never used for marking household linens, and nowadays are seldom used even for the hand embroidered centerpieces.

The damask table linen in striped design or with a flower wreath on it is especially popular just now, while luncheon cloths and doilies in damask with a simple hemstitched border are nice for the housewife who has a fine table and are much smarter than using a tablecloth for the noonday meal.

Of course every housewife knows that table linen must always be hemmed by hand if it is not hemstitched and should be ironed while wet that it may have a smooth gloss and yet be unstarched, for starched table linen is by no means in good taste.

For the center of the table the round doily edge with deep linen lace or cluny lace is much in vogue just now, having superseded both the embroidered centerpieces and the drawnwork, but such bits of the household linen are never regulated very much by changing season, but represent simply the taste of the housewife.

The use of cross stitch to mark the guest towels, which are so popular now, continues in favor and is also seen on some of the larger towels, but a single letter heavily worked in white is to be noted in the linens of the fashionable brides of the autumn.

Single initials also mark much of the bed linen this year, hemstitched sheets and pillow cases and plain counterpanes with pillow shams to match being most in vogue, though elaborate flowered sets are still seen in many of the shops that make a specialty of this sort of linen.

How to Crochet a Cover For a Hot Water Bottle.

A cover for a hot water bag is readily crocheted, using plain crochet stitches, finished with a row of shell stitches, which form a ruffle when the cover is drawn tightly around the neck of the bottle. Ribbon, linen tape or crocheted string may be used as a drawstring to confine the fullness of the ruffle.

The small bottles intended for children often have crocheted covers, with a quaint animal form, a black cat, bunny or dog cross stitched over the plain crochet. It is very attractive and especially nice for the kiddies.

How to Please a Bride by Giving Her Unusual Things.

An idea which may appeal to a bride is embodied in a set of coat hangers—four, six or a dozen. To make a very complete gift, which will no doubt find a welcome place in the new guest room closet, have slipper and shoe trees match the coat hangers. Chintz or brocade covered round hat boxes finished with gold braid handles and a smart flat bow of French miniature on top would be a charming accessory for the bride's closet, just the thing to have handy for a hat which she wears every day.

THE CORRECT JUVENILE.

A Serviceable Suit For School and Athletics.

IDEAL FOR SPORTS.

Corduroy, covert or serge will develop well this practical suit for the outdoor girl. Strong bone buttons, belt and sensible pockets are its only garnishings. Please note how every accessory—boots, gloves, tie and hat—carries out the idea.

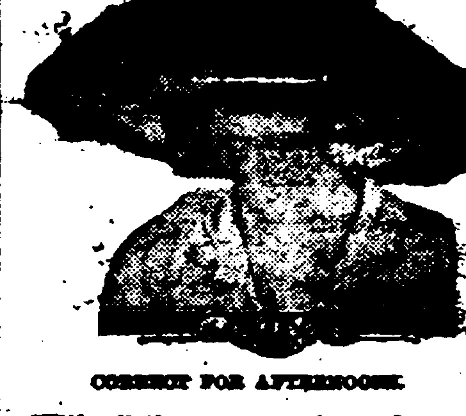
Proper Lighting.

Add immensely to the attractiveness of your home by diffusing the lights instead of focusing them on one point. Eye strain will be relieved and shadows and outlines will be softened, especially when amber lights are used. The new indirect lighting fixtures are replacing old fashioned ones, making the lighting problem more artistic and less expensive.

Much the same effect may be produced with less expense by frosted bulbs and globes, gelatin films and glass diffusing plates. There are various types of this indirect lighting suitable for all rooms, from the kitchen to the parlor, and it is to be recommended as a blessing to the busy eyes and the tense nerves of today.

A CHARMING HAT.

One That Admirably Fits In Between Seasons.



CORRECT FOR AFTERNOONS.

With all the gauzy coolness demanded by warm weather, this hat nevertheless suggests fall with its fur edged brim and bright colored flower on the front of the crown. It is both elegant and simple.

Concerning Women on Juries.

"Do women have to sit on juries if they vote?" Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the National American Woman Suffrage association, was recently asked:

"Not necessarily," said Dr. Shaw; "but I have seen a lot of juries which needed to have some one sit on them, and I have known women who have had to stand up at most difficult and disagreeable employments who would be glad to sit on juries and receive about double the price they can get by working. And these men and women who prey upon the virtue of girlhood and boyhood would rather face Satan himself than a jury of mothers. Yes, we need women on some juries."

Activities of Women.

Philadelphia has a woman barber who has a lucrative business.

The British war department now recognizes women to the extent of giving them rank as noncommissioned officers in the army.

Women have so far supplanted men in some of the large industries of Germany that there are now 7,000 doing the ordinary work of their husbands and brothers. Out of this total 2,000 are in the iron works and have to do work customarily considered too heavy for women.

DAY OF THOUGHT FOR THE JEWS

Celebration Begins Tonight at Sunset; Known as Rosh Hoshannah or New Year's, Observed in Syracuse.

But three of the business places in East 1st st. will close tonight to remain closed until Saturday to celebrate Rosh Hoshannah, or New Year's, which, according to the Jewish calendar, begins this week. The celebration this year is the beginning of the year 5676, according to the Hebrew calendar. The Jewish New Year's day, Tisri 1, 5676, will commence tomorrow night at sunset. The stores to remain closed for the holidays are those of Samuel Waldhorn, H. Amdursky and J. H. Bennett. The Katz and Lipsky stores will remain open.

The Jewish New Year's day is a time for serious thought on the meaning of life; it evokes pious contemplaiton of the difficult and inevasible problem as to right and wrong and its appeal is not that we should get more out of practical life but value more genuinely, more truthfully, more morally the life God has entrusted to us.

Much of the success and failure of our work depend, not upon our equipment, but upon our motives. The Jewish New Year's day, accordingly, is placed by a wise tradition at the beginning of autumn, when men enter upon their enterprises and obligations with zest and zeal. Just then they need a right interpretation of life and a true measure of its values.

The antique features of the ritual of that day express the aspirations all men feel equally. The trumpet calls, constituting the central part in the worship of that day, are appeals for the moral stir which men should feel when they contemplate their experiences and seek for reinforcement of their hopes. The calls are also an appeal to the large sense of life. Our week-day wishes and prayers are self-centered and do not give us a perspective of our relations and obligations to the community and fellow man, and of their influence upon us. But the New Year's day offers us an occasion to reaffirm our respect for and trust in Providence which is the organization of all lives into an all-encompassing justice. The Jew comprehends this as a comfort in the case of misfortunes and as monition in the successes he may have. The function of the New Year's day is to establish a moral judgment in our life and experiences.

SAYS HE INVENTED UNSINKABLE SHIP

But Pittsburgh Man Refuses to Tell of What It Is Made.

Pittsburgh.—A battleship that "cannot be sunk" has been invented by a Pittsburgh man whose identity is kept secret by his attorney, John C. Thompson. The material out of which the "unsinkable" ship is to be manufactured is also a secret. Plans and specifications have been placed in the hands of the secretary of the navy, according to Mr. Thompson.

Mr. Thompson says his client has received a letter from Secretary Daniels stating that as soon as the new advisory board of inventors and scientists is organized the invention will be placed before it.

It is stated that the inventor depends almost exclusively on the interior construction of the ship for his results. Under his plans all the craft of the United States navy would remain the same to all outward appearances, but all would be unsinkable. They would carry just as many guns as at present, but their armor would not be as heavy as now.

According to the inventor, a battleship equipped with his invention would be practically invincible in battle because no matter how many times the ship would be struck the craft would remain upright and continue to float.

BUYING SHEEP IN KANSAS.

Farmers See Food For Million In Fields of Flattened Grain.

Topeka.—Floods can't keep Kansas down. Most states would have raised the white flag over the heavy grain loss from rain and floods, but Kansas has the old ensign flying over the fort.

Grain that lies on the ground, that the hail and the winds and rain have knocked flat, is to be converted into mutton. From every county farmers are sending orders for sheep, and within thirty days there will be more than a million sheep feeding throughout the state.

Along every valley in the state unprecedented rains sent the water out across the fields when the grain should have been ripening. More than a million and a half acres of wheat and oats were ruined. With sheep getting fat on this grain, the elimination of harvesting, thrashing and marketing, the farmers are looking upon life a little more cheerfully these days.

WEDDING RING LOST 42 YEARS IS FOUND

Hermosa Beach, Cal., Sept. 8.—When Mrs. James McGuire, an aged summer visitor at this beach, returned from a trip to her old homestead in Iowa, she proudly displayed her wedding ring which she had lost on her wedding day, forty-two years ago.

DR. FISKE TO HAVE CHOICE OF FIVE HOUSES

Syracuse, Sept. 8.—When the Rev. Dr. Charles Fiske of Baltimore, Md., bishop coadjutor-elect of Central New York, comes to Syracuse shortly after his consecration in Baltimore on September 29, he will choose from five beautiful houses, selected by a committee of Syracusans, the one in which he and his family will make their home in that city.

The Rev. Dr. Karl Schwartz, rector of the Church of the Saviour, who is a member of the committee which picked out the various residences, said today that all of the five buildings are located within proximity of the center of the city and that any one is available for the future coadjutor-bishop. AUBURN'S POPULATION GAINS ONLY 1,284

Albany, Sept. 8.—While Auburn's gain in population dpring the last five years does not come up to the increase which the city made between 1905 and 1910, itn evertheless amounts to 1,284 and results in the prison city passing the 35,000 mark. Including the inmates of the various institutions located in Auburn the city now has a population of 35,952 as compared with 34,668 with which Auburn was credited in the enumeration of 1910. The official census figures for Auburn were given out today by Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State, under whose direction the June count was made.

During the eight years from 1892 to 1900 Auburn enjoyed a gain in population of 5,608, the census of the former year crediting the city with 24,737 residents, so that a gain is shown of 11.215 in the twenty three years thath ave intervened.

In 1900 Auburn had 30,345 residents. By 1905 the number had ben increased reaching a total of 31,422. The five years had witnessed a gain of 1,077.

Between 1905 and 1910 Auburn's increase was more rapid, amounting to 3,246 and bringing the city up to 34,668.

Auburn's alien population according to this year's census foots up to 4,188, or about 112 per cent.

Falsehoods, Declare City Officials, of Committee Advertised Statements

Several of the more important charges against the city administration and its lax methods of handling the city affairs, preferred by the Taxpayers' Committee in advertisements appearing in local papers were indignantly denied this morning by city officials. Mayor Fox, in particular, wished to take exception to some of the statements made by the Taxpayers' Committee, and stated that the great majority of that organization's recent statements were nothing less than falsehoods.

In a recent advertisement the Taxpayers' Committee charges that the Mayor, City Attorney George M. Fanning and City Clerk Leon Scudder went to New York in connection with a small bond issue, and that the expenses of the trip were paid by the city. Mayor Fox denies that he ever went to New York at the city's expense at any time, and City Clerk Scudder said he never went to New York in company with the Mayor and City Attorney on any account, and that he has made only one trip to New York City at the expense of the taxpayers since holding office under this administration.

The Taxpayers' Committee also charges that the city's bonded indebtedness at the present time is $612,651.75. By a trial balance taken September 1 the City Chamberlain, George Washburn, finds the indebtedness to total $5551,014.24, or more than $60,000 less than the amount charged by the Taxpayers' Committee. The City Chamberlain also wishes to announce that he will give correct information regarding the city's finances to any of the members of the Taxpayers' Committee who desire it.

GERMANIC ALLIES MUST FORCE A BATTLE NOW OR FAIL; CZAR'S CHANCES

Hilaire Belloc, foremost military writer in Europe, furnishes the International News Service with the following [illegible]

Can the Teutons compel the Russian armies concentrated in the neighborhood of Brest and up northwards, over a front of about sixty miles, to accept battle?

The Germans went into their great Polish adventure on April 30 last, having accumulated a vast amount of heavy munitionment and concentrated against the Dunajec front the great mass of their winter-trained men.

They proposed to attack, of the two great groups of enemies, the Eastern group.

Why did the Teutons this determine to make the Eastern field the scene of their great gamble?

Because they appreciated through their intelligence Department, as well as through their general knowledge of the conditions of Europe, that Russia, very poorly industrialized, almost entirely an agricultural state, possessed of few railways, and (oddly enough) of still fewer hard roads, would be in a state of grave inferiority with the coming of the early summer.

The war has shown that success will ultimately depend upon the power to equip with rifles and with guns, and to provide with ammunition for both, the enormous number available on paper to the belligerents.

The Germans and Austrians were as much at fault in this provision as their unwilling opponents. They had, indeed, the advantage of having prepared for war for about three years; they had therefore all ready the equipment for their maximum total potential man-power. But shell in the number required for the new conditions had to be made.

France and the Central Empires saw that at once—as long ago as last September. France, with the greater part by far of her mines and of her industrial equipment occupied by the invaders, yet did better than the Central Empires in the months that were critical in this affair. With a population of less than a third of the Central Empires she reached by June a production of shell close upon half their production, and has now somewhat surpassed that proportion.

But as against Russia the difference was enormous. The difference in the power of equipment of infantry was and remains most serious. The difference in the power of production of shell was at the outset of the Polish campaign out of all reason. It was perhaps 5 to 1.

Under such circumstances the Germans wisely determined to stake the remainder of their strength upon a decision in the East.

The attempts to obtain this decision (each hitherto unsuccessful) appear in two phases very different in their length and their cost. During the first phase, which lasted from the last days of April to the end of June, it was Germany's determination to break through the centere of the Russian line to split theh Russian army into two portions, and to defeat these in detail.

In this first attempt, the attempt to break the Russion forces, they came nearest to success in the very first days of the onslaught.

MRS. WILLIAM F. STEWART UNANIMOUS CHOICE AS GRAND VICE TEMPLAR

Echoes from the recent State convention I. O. Good Templars continue to be received. One of them being that never before in the history of Lodge No. 88 have there been in a short period as many accessions to the membership of the order in Fulton as since the convention held here in August. An increased membership is not the only favorable result of the recent meeting. As a rule such meetings result disastrously to lodges, but in the case of Fulton the tables have been turned, as at each meeting a number of applications for membership are received and initiatory work is quite the order of the day. Monday night's meeting witnessed a pleasing result of the renewed interest in Good Templarism when eight applications were acted upon, each candidate being a person of esteem in this community. Four new members were initiated.

At the same meeting of the order a reception was given in honor of Mrs. W. F. Stewart, whose election as Grand Vice Templar at the August convention has met with universal approval. At the conclusion of the reception light refreshments were served and a happy social hour followed.

William F. Stewart, who gave to the state convention a lot of untiring zeal, returned today from the Oswego County District Lodge, which was held in Pulaski, and he is enthusiastic over the prospects for the order in this section of New York.

At yesterday's session of the District Lodge Gilman D. Gates of Fernwood and a member of Pulaski Lodge of Good Templars was elected as chief templar of Oswego County District Lodge of the International Order of Good Templars. Other officers include for district councillor, William F. Stewart, of Fulton; district vice-templar, Mrs. Robert Babcock of Pulaski; district secretary, Ernest Stewart of Fulton; treasurer, Clarence Rounds of Southwest Oswego.

The appointive officers are: Marshal, Franklin Havens of Minetto; deputy marshal, Mrs. Oliver Schoolcraft of Fulton; chaplain, Mrs. Jennie Pummer of Fulton; guard, Oliver Schoolcraft of Fulton; sentinel, Mrs. Ezekiel Casterline of Pulaski.

New York Woman Choked to Death by Robbers; Large Number of Jewels Stolen

New York, Sept. 9.—Mrs. Elizabeth Nichols, widow of James E. Nichols, one of the founders of the wholesale grocery house of Austin, Nichols & Co., was strangled to death last night by robbers in her home. It is believed $500,000 worth of jewels were stolen.

After overpowering the servants and binding and gagging them, three robbers went to Mrs. Nichol's library, on the third floor of thel arge dwelling, murdered her and took from her neck a ribbon on which was the key to her strong box. In this steel box were diamonds, pearls, rubies, sapphires, emeralds ando ther jewels, all in settings, which were said to be worth more than a half million dollars.

Inspector Faurot, who was one of the first to reach the house, admitted the murderers had obtained the key to the strong box, but he would not say if they had obtained the jewels. The belief was about the house that the thieves had obtained the fortune in jewels, besides much money, making perhaps the biggest jewel robbery ever committed in this city.

The front basement doorbell rang a few minutes before nine o'clock last night. The butler and the cook were out. Owney Talls, the second man, was on the main floor, attending the door, while in the library up stairs were Mrs. Nichols and her personal maid, a young French woman. When the bell rang Talls went to the basement and opened the inner door. He saw through the barred door, a man with a package. The man said it was for Mrs. Nichols. Talls opened the outer or barred door and instantly this man and two others sprang upon him.

While this was taking place the commotion was heard by Mrs. Nichols and her maid, three floors above. The maid ran downstairs to learn the trouble. As she reached the basement floor she was seized. She screamed and struggled with the robbers, but one dealt her a blow on her face with his fist that stunned her and then it was easy for them to gag her and tie her up with ropes, as they had done to the footman.

What followed then is a matter of conjecture, except that it is known they murdered Mrs. Nichols and probably stole her large collection of jewels. Apparently Mrs. Nichols was over taken in her library, on the floor above the drawing room where her maid had left her. That she tsruggled with the murderers was indicated by her bruised face and her torn garments and also by the disarranged furniture.

By that time Mrs. Nichols had been lifted to a bed and the maid was bending over her when the physicians arrived. They asked whats he had been doing and she said she was searching for Mrs. Nichols' key to the jewel chest, which she said she kept fastened to a ribbon and between her corsets and her back. It was gone.

The physicians soon found Mrs. Nichols was dead. They at first said she had died of fright, but when Inspector Faurot in charge of detectives and Inspector Cray, of the Homicide Bureau, reached the house and made an examination they both agreed that Mrs. Nichols had been strangled to death and that a towel had been used.

While Inspector Faurot would not say that the thieves had or had not obtained the large jewel collection, he did say that at dinner and later, when her maid left her go down stairs, she wore several large diamond and pearl rings on her fingers and a pair of large diamond earrings. When she was found dead all these were gone and her fingers were bruised and her ear lobes mutilated when the jewels had been jerked from her.

Inspector Cray said that Mrs. Nichols apparently had foughtd esperately with her murderers. Besides the disarrangement of the furniture and her torn dress, he said her face was cut and scratched by the fingers and fists of her assailants and that one blow had smashed her glasses against her eyes, probably blinding her.

Mrs. Nichols was the chief beneficiary under the will of her husband, James E. Nichols, one of the founders of the wholesale grocery firm of Austin, Nichols& Co., who died at Marienbad, Austria, on July 22, 1914, at the age of 69 years. Sher eceived the income of a trust fund of $1,000,000, and half the large residuary estate outright. The estate was estimated to be worth more than $2,000,000.

Lettuce Raising Not Always the Bonanza Described by Press Reports of Profits

"Many people are getting erroneous impressions from the statements given publicity in the newspapers regarding the big profits in lettuce culture," said a prominent local produce grower this morning. "For the past few weeks, the fact that growers in this vicinity are getting as high as $3.50 a crate for first-grade lettuce has been given much prominence and already many people are foolishly deciding to enter the lettuce raising business under the impression that it's a sure way to get rich quick. To these I want to give a word of warning."

"The lettuce growers here remember when the best price we could get for our lettuce was 35 cents a crate. In those dark days little was said about the profits in the lettuce game. Every shipment meant a loss to the grower of $300 or more. Now things are different, but because we can get high prices this year that gives us no assurance that we can get them next year, or perhaps for five or six years.

"I don't want people to hold the impression that I want to exclude competition from this business, but I claim it is a big risk. Let some one try to buy lettuce land in this vicinity and they will realize that it means an investment. Land for lettuce culture is selling now for $400 or $500 an acre. Two years ago I could have purchased some good lettuce land for $60 an acre, ready for the plow. I turned it down, and the next spring the owner sold it for $125 an acre. The new owner was offered $275 an acre for it later and wouldn't sell. That shows the price of the land.

"Yes, I sent out a shipment last week of second-grade lettuce that brought me $3 a crate, and I cleared $150 on one shipment. But that is only this year and may not come again for some time."

BISHOP JONES HERE TO ATTEND SUSQUEHANNA CONFERENCE IN SESSION

The 55th annual Susquehanna conference of the Free Methodist church is being held in the local church, this city. The first session began yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Bishop B. R. Jones of Alameda, Cal., presided. The first session opened with singing and prayer, after which the Bishop spoke a few well chosen words of greeting and direction as to how the present session may become a blessing to all in attendance. The conference secretary of last year assisted in the organization of the conference, after which thirty-two preachers and twenty-eight delegates responded to the roll call.

The conference then proceeded to elect the lay members of the stationing committee. C. Dixon was elected to serve for the Wayne and Syracuse districts; Peter Van Dyke for the Binghamton and Corning districts; Cyrenus Stevens for the Watertown, Utica and Saratoga districts; E. Y. Shattuck for the Burlington district. Some miscellaneous business was transacted, after which a resolution was adopted toward the establishing of a band workers' home.

The committee on public worship announced that Bishop B. R. Jones was to preach in the evening.

COLWELL BARNS STRUCK BY LIGHTNING TODAY

This afternoon lightning struck the large barn owned by Mr. M. F. Colwell on the Emery road and as a result was burned to the ground. A silo erected just last year and attached to the barn was also burned to the ground, as also was a large hen house.

The local fire department responded to the call with ladders, and did all that was possible without the aid of the hose.

The Colwells came here from Iowa two years ago. Their misfortune is widely deplored.

PUBLIC MARKETS.

Olean recently opened a public market copied after the successful market conducted in Utica. The question in Olean was whether or not the women would go to the market with baskets on their arms to make purchases from farmers who were expected to come with produce. They came and the women were of every social position. It is estimated that no less than 3,000 people attended the market. Perhaps when the novelty wears off the number will largely decrease.

Auburn started a market some few months ago and it is a success. In August, according to the market master, the number of sales was 32,290. The market was open 14 days during the month and 514 producers came to sell their goods. The average daily sales were 2,351, the largest number was on August 28, when the sales totaled 2,351. The smallest number was at the beginning of the month, when on one day there were but 480 sales.

The figures telling what was sold are interesting. The records show that 1,114 bushels of potatoes were sold; poultry, 5,935 pounds; eggs, 1,408 dozen; berries, 5,980 quarts; cabbage, 3,624 heads; tomatoes, 11,904 quarts; peas, 80 bushels; celery, 10,080 bunches; onions, nine bushels, and ears of corn, 50,256. The Central Labor Union of Auburn, it is reported, will endeavor to induce the Common Council to provide sheltered quarters for the market during the winter.—Utica Observer.

The Farmer Is It.

The Government Crop Report came out asu sual last month with its serried ranks of figures, hundreds and thousands of millions of bushels, and the statisticians are now busy sticking in dollar marks as their taste and fancy distate. The harvest is to be better than ever and the economic foundations of our country are solid. While Wall street has been spinning its black-and-red wheel of war stocks, and the politicians have been penrose-ing up and down the land that prosperity depends on them and the lack of it on the other fellow, the plain men of the United States have gone out to the fields and plowed prosperity into existence. It takes hard work, but it's the only way. The basis for the business of next year has been Montana, in the bottoms of Missouri and Illinois, on the tree-studded slopes of the older states and the irrigated flats of the new West. The predicted results are overwhelmingly impressive in bushels and tons and bales, but greater yet is the whispered intelligence, the faithfulness, and earnest work that made the results come. As science gets further hold among us these same qualities will reap even greater triumphs. Our cities have their place and pride, they do most of the advertising and make nearly all the noise, but when the crop returns come in we know on what the living strength of our country securely rests. The farmer is IT in the United States, and the rest of us might as well acknowledge the fact. He is in league with the everlasting procession of the seasons, and his allies are the powers of the earth and the unchnaging needs of men. His daily work relies on that eternal promise of 4,000 years ago: "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." This year has seen it fulfilled once more. —Collier's Weekly.

THEY ARE THINKING

"Citizens, Wake Up;" "Think it Over;" "Use Your Heads." These are some of the commands of the Taxpayers' Committee which appeared in last night's Evening Times. Think it over is good because it is extremely timely. Most of the tragedies and most of the errors of life are committed by people who "did not think."

Less than a month ago one could meet numbers of men who were on the wrong road in the campaign for Commission-Manager form of Government. They were opposed to the plan because they did not stop to think about the difference between what they have been getting since the city became a fact by the consolidation of two village and the efficiency that obtains under a plan that makes five men responsible to each individual taxpayer for every dollar expended. Today it is different and one does not hear numbers of men questioning the motives of those who are working with might and main to give this city a government whose responsible heads shall be at the beck and call of the people themselves.

Yes, the people of Fulton are thinking—thinking about the difference between the lack of business system in the old or present form of government and all that it means to have a government with a responsible head.

People acquire foolish and deadly habits without thinking and very often the wrong road in business is taken without thinking. Running a city is a business; it is a big business that cannot be run properly unless it is thoughtfully run. Millions of dollars are squandered before the spender thinks. In our case thousands of dollars have been spent because those who had the spending to do did not have time to think, or because they were incapable of thinking.

This time it is apparent that the people are thinking when it is important to think. They are not waiting until after the horse has been stolen.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS
President American Society for Thrift

Many young people aspire to college education who have not the money to pay for their tuition. Hundreds give up the idea, but there we find boys and girls with the grit and thrift to earn the money. What one boy or one girl can do, others can do.

A piece of ground less than one-half acre in size is sending a Pennsylvania lad through college. When he was twelve years old, Albert Trumpeter, now aged 19 years, of Monaca, Pa., was given this piece of ground by his father. He had no expert knowledge of gardening when he began to cultivate it, but he sought pointers from every successful gardener he knew. During the first year he supplied his father's and his uncle's tables with vegetables the entire season and when fall came he had made $75 which he immediately banked as a nucleus of his educational fund.

During the next six years the boy cultivated his garden with the greatest care and was rewarded for his efforts with vegetables that were superior to those of any farmer thereabouts. He took his vegetables to town and peddled them from door to door in a wheelbarrow. Because of their luscious appearance he had no difficulty in disposing of them, and he built up a regular route. He saved his proceeds and bent his energies to improving the quality of his garden truck. He cleared in his banner season $175 and in seven years $875—almost enough to pay his way through college. During the summer vacations, while in college, he will again raise vegetables on his half acre and devote the proceeds to his educational fund. He attributes his success to the fact that he saved every cent of the profits.

Hens are sending a thrifty girl through college—forty of them, one vacant city lot and plenty of grit in one year yielded Grace Breed enough money to pay all the expenses of her freshman year at the Colorado Agricultural College.

It was the girl's ambition to go to college, but because of her father's poor health and consequent inability to work, she knew that she would have to pay her own way. She had no idea how to earn money, till one day while feeding the family chickens, the thought came to her "Why not let the chickens earn it for me?"

She understood the care of them and she immediately acted on her inspiration and so successfully that the chickens have paid her way for a year. She read a great deal on raising poultry and applied all the scientific knowledge to them she had gained. In the meantime she had worked up a trade, selling only to private families and was very particular to keep accurate accounts. She found it not only fascinating work, but a very satisfactory way of earning money. She was able to finish her work by noon each day, and had no expenses, such as care fare.

This boy and girl did only what other boys and girls can do if they have the same amount of energy, ambition and thrift.

A Dollar That Can't Be Spent

By HERBERT KAUFMAN
Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

EVERY dollar spent in advertising is not only a seed dollar which produces a profit for the merchant, but is actually retained by him even after he has paid it to the publisher.

Advertising creates a good will equal to the cost of the publicity.

Advertising really costs nothing. While it uses funds it does not use them up. It helps the founder of a business to grow rich and then keeps his business alive after his death.

It eliminates the personal equation. It perpetuates confidence in the store and makes it possible for a merchant to withdraw from business without having the profits of the business withdrawn from him. It changes a name to an institution—an institution which will survive its builder.

It is really an insurance policy which costs nothing—pays a premium each year instead of calling for one and renders it possible to change the entire personnel of a business without disturbing its prosperity.

Advertising renders the business stronger than the man—independent of his presence. It permanentizes systems of merchandising, the track of which is left for others to follow.

A business which is not advertised must rely upon the personality of its proprietor, and personality in business is a decreasing factor. The public does not want to know the man who owns the store—it isn't interested in him but in his goods. When an unadvertised business is sold it is only worth as much as its stock of goods and its fixtures. There is no good will to be paid for—it does not exist—it has not been created. The name over the door means nothing except to the limited stream of people from the immediate neighborhood, any of whom could tell you more about some store ten miles away which has regularly delivered its shop news to their homes.

It is as shortsighted for a man to build a business which dies with his death or ceases with his inaction, as it is unfair for him not to provide for the continuance of its income to his family.

Alderman William Sullivan of the Second ward came out for women's suffrage Tuesday night before the meeting of the Common Council, in one of his characteristic, striaght-from-the-shoulder speeches. In conversation with a Times reporter on several topics, the women's suffrage amendment was touched upon, and when the reporter inquired the alderman's stand, Mr. Sullivan said, "I'm for it—as strong as on onion!"

The Fulton Italian band, recently organized, is practicing diligently twice a week in the City Hall, under the direction of M. Raphaelo Cardoze, of New York, who is spending a few months in Syracuse. The band is fast rounding in to form, to use a sporting term, and its supporters predict, with true Latin loyalty, that it will give the Elks' band a run for the money after some training. M. Cardoze is an accomplished musician and is familiar with every instrument. His unfailing patience and tact, coupled with his keen sense of artistic rendition, is already making its effect felt among the band members.

Have sympathy for the poor hay-fever sufferers! There are many members of the clan in this city, and several of the more prominent—(members, not sufferers,) are seriously considering the institution of a club here which will be elaborately decorated with pine boughs and sweet-smelling balsam, and where the words "golden rod," or "fields of hay" will suffice for capital punishment.

John W. Stevenson's string of fast steppers (we must cease this alliteration) will make their initial appearance at the Watertown fair today, according to reports, after several weeks of seclusion, which have been well spent in careful training. Michigan King, Florence L., and several other recent purchases will meander after first money on several tracks in the northern section of the state before the season closes. Their owner is considering entering them in the races at the State fair.

We had a dream last night, editorially. We dreamt we saw two gentlemen, hoary-headed and gray with years, standing on the corner of First and Cayuga streets arguing loud and long. It was the year 1945, if we remember correctly. The men were looking up First street and one said, "Nossir! As long as I'm on deck that street shall never be paved 34 feet wide!"

And the other, removing his glasses, returned, "We'll fight it to the last ditch!"

And the tihrd man, coming up, said, "I won't resign!"

FOR THE DEAR OLD FLAG HE DIED

For my country's cause I go, dear,
Were the parting words he said
'Neath the sod in sunny Cuba,
Lies my darling, golden head.

Chorus:

Tell my mother may God bless her;
Kiss my sister dear good-bye;
Tell my sweetheart Heaven protect her;
For the dear old Flag I die.

He marched with his comrades bravely,
The call of duty to fulfill;
Met his death like a true soldier
At the charge of San Juan Hill.
There amid the dreadful conflict,
Crash of rifle, din and smoke,
See the boy with golden ringlets
Wounded falls upon the slope.

By his side a comrade's kneeling
Trying to staunch the crimson tide
From his bosom, vain endeavors.
For the dear old Flag he died.

Listen! 'tis her name he whispers
In a voice so faint and low;
Tell her, Charley, when you meet her
That my call has come to go.

Take her picture from my bosom
With my life blood it is stained;
Let me look once more upon it
While a spark of life remains.

To that distant Northern City
Came the message he is dead!
Ah! those lines contain the heart break,
Dims her eyes and bows her head.

Weeps she for her fallen hero.
Death these loving hearts divide,
But with trembling lips she whispers,
For our dear old Flag he died.

Piano Strings.

Supplanting the hard, high tension strand of old, the piano wire in demand today for the highest grade instrument is tough and fibrous and of absolute uniformity, and when cut it shows a clean white steel.

The piano makers have, by actual test, been brought to see that the softer wire has the greater artistic merit. The latter vibrates so evenly throughout, when actuated by the proper degree of energy, that a true fundamental tone results, with just enough of the octave to impart brilliancy, of the fifth to impart timbre and of the third and sixth to impart richness, and will be amplified by the sounding board.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

ONE DAY STRIKE PLAN ABANDONED

But Woman Suffragists Refute an Anti Argument.

SHOW WHERE WOMEN BELONG

To Keep Women In the Home For One Day Would Cripple All Business, and, the Possibilities of Such an Action Having Been Shown, Leaders Reject Idea—Their Object Accomplished.

Year in and year out women seeking the vote have been met with the platitude, "Woman's place is in the home."

No suffragist ever contended that it wasn't if the home was forthcoming and the need of woman in it was greater than the need of her outside of it.

In vain have they set forth that in one case out of three, to consider New York state alone, the woman of voting age hasn't any home unless she goes out and earns the upkeep of one.

In vain have they shown by argument and by figures the world's grave need of woman outside of the home, the worldwide reliance on her in connection with industry, business, public utility services, office work, hospitals, schools.

The anti-suffragists merely shut their eyes to the facts afforded by the economic history of the times, gazed sentimentally into vacancy and murmured, "Woman's place is in the home."

So the suffragists said: "Very well. Let's accept the edict. Let's ask woman to stay at home for just one day."

They let their project be known.

The result?

A storm of protest that shook New York city from the Battery to Spuyten Duyvil arose. The very idea of woman abiding by the moss hung precept one single day was denounced as dangerous, a national menace, "lawless." The ringleaders were solemnly informed by one editor that they might find themselves in jail for even talking about such a thing.

Anti-suffragists in particular fell over one another in their haste to condemn women for the proposal to apply the anti axiom for even one day. According to one New York anti-leader, Mrs. William Forse Scott, it "proved the limit of lawlessness to which suffragists were prepared to go."

Shades of anti-suffrage tradition—lawless for women to stay in their only acknowledged place, the home, for one day!

Meantime business men, factory men, office men, editors and all sorts of employers were crying: "Enough, enough! We see the point. You have called that platitudinous bluff. Do stop!"

So the suffragists stopped, not really wanting to cripple the world's work. They stopped and passed resolution which set forth that—

THERE CAN BE NO HOME EXCEPT AS WOMAN TAKES HER PLACE OUTSIDE AS WELL AS INSIDE IT.

Therefore be it resolved, That the agitation for a woman's day at home shall be indefinitely postponed as unnecessary at this juncture in the campaign for Votes For Women.

FARM WOMEN ON ELECTION DAY.

A City Man Who Believes In Their Public Spirit.

When a man begins to generalize about women he generally generalizes wrong. When a city man begins to predict what farm women will or will not do under new conditions the chances grow slimmer for a correct guess. Mr. Henry L. Stimson, for instance, has drawn much criticism upon himself for his cocksureness about the difficulty of getting farm women to go to the polls if woman suffrage wins in New York state Nov. 2.

But by no means do all city men agree with him. Answering him, Mr. Charles H. Strong, former president of the City Club of New York, says:

"By some also it may be taken as paying scant courtesy to the public spirit of the women who live in the rural communities and on the farm, who, according to my observation, read more along political lines and are quite as patriotic and therefore as likely to vote as their sisters in the metropolis.

LETTERS CLOG POSTOFFICE.

Lonely Girl Who Wrote Egg Message Fails to Call For 200 Proposals.

Stroudsburg, Pa.—Unless Sadie S. Smith, the lonely girl, calls for the 200 or more letters awaiting her at the Stroudsburg postoffice Postmaster John M. Decker will make application for enlargement of the office.

Sadie is the girl who wrote a message on an egg stating that she was lonely on the farm and then placed it with the other eggs which were being prepared for shipment. This particular egg fell into the hands of Guy Hanby, a clerk in a grocery store at Wilmington, Del., and immediately Guy's heart yearned for lonely Sadie. So did the hearts of others, else there would not now be 200 letters waiting for her at the local office.

A local paper has started the search for Sadie, the Monroe county lonely farm girl. The paper says: "Have a heart, Sadie. Never start anything you can't finish. Get your letters, but have a care about that nice fellow. He may not be near as nice as some young man in your own neighborhood who will make you happier and more contented than life without friends in a great city. Ponder well, Sadie, before you leap."

LEANS FROM CAR; SAVES GIRL.

Motorman Effects Heroic Rescue of Child Walking Between Tracks.

New York.—The presence of mind and courage of James Lavelle, a motorman on one of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Bath Beach trains, saved the life of an unidentified little girl, four years old, who mistook the space between the rails of the West End line for a promenade and left the sidewalk to walk there.

Lavelle was taking his train from Coney Island, loaded with women and children, when near Forty-first street, on New Utrecht avenue, he saw the child about forty feet ahead. The trains at this spot run on the surface of the street. Lavelle blew his whistle; but the child apparently did not hear. He jammed on the emergency brakes and then, realizing that he could not stop in time, ran to the front platform and, reaching forward, caught hold of the little girl. He dropped her to one side. She escaped with only a few slight bruises.

Two Points of View.

He had a lot of money, but no discoverable ancestors, and so it came that he affected contempt for pride of birth. And there was another man whose family tree was tall and umbrageous, but who possessed no other assets worth mentioning. A discussion between those two men was of profound interest. Each avoided hurting the other's feelings, but it was easy to detect an undercurrent of antagonism. They concluded:

"Say what you will," asserted the one, "it is a fine thing to come of good stock."

"It's a finer thing," replied the other, with finality, "to own it."

The Jaw of an Otter.

You can find an example of nature's adaptation of the jaw to use in the case of certain carnivora, like the otter—a big weasel that has acquired aquatic habits. The jaws of such beasts are so fixed in the sockets that dislocation is impossible. In some instances you cannot, even after the animal is dead, separate the jaw from the head. This arrangement is evidently designed to enable the beast to bite to the greatest advantage without danger that the chewing apparatus will come loose.

That "Bad Woman's Vote."

The report on criminal statistics of Secretary of State Hugo deals a blow at the menace of the so called "bad woman's vote" in New York. According to the figures, the "bad woman" is not nearly so much of a menace as the "bad man." In the courts of the Empire State in 1914 there were fourteen convictions against men to one against women. Women are getting better, and men are getting worse, if criminal statistics are any guage.

BANNER WOMAN SUFFRAGE PARADE

Pageant to Be Given In New York City, Oct. 23.

25,000 WOMEN TO BE IN LINE

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, as the Official Head of the Organized Suffragists of Twenty-seven Nations, to Lead the Procession—Woman Suffrage Party to Furnish Numerical Strength.

Last, biggest and best the suffragists are calling the suffrage parade set for 3 o'clock Saturday afternoon, Oct. 23. But it will be a banner parade literally as well as figuratively. Every marcher in the ranks who does not carry a standard or a transparency will be expected to carry a "Votes For Women" pennant, so that the marching line from end to end will be aflutter with the suffrage slogan. Above this rippling mass of color will rise the tall standards and transparencies that will tell the suffrage story as it goes the rounds of the world today.

One of the features that will distinguish the "banner parade" is the international division, which will lead all the rest. Never before has suffrage as a world movement been presented as it will be in this division. At the head of it and leading the entire parade will march Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, founder and president of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance, who has linked up the women of twenty-seven countries in an international campaign for suffrage.

After the International Division will come the executive board of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, led by its president, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw.

The Empire State Campaign Committee will be represented by the standards and banners of its component organisations and supplemented by its Press and Publicity Council. Mrs. Raymond Brown will lead her organization, the New York State Woman Suffrage Association.

Miss Mary Garrett Hay, city chairman of the Woman Suffrage party, will head the "Party," which will furnish the numerical strength of the parade, its thousands falling into line by districts, committees and leagues. The "Party" is the largest of the city organizations, more than 150,000 men and women being enrolled in its ranks. Its famous orange and black banners always win unstinted applause as its forces come sweeping up the avenue in suffrage parades. This year the "Party" expects to eclipse all previous records.

The Women's Political Union, the Political Equality Association, the Collegiate Equal Suffrage League, the Equal Franchise Society and the Men's Leagues complete the list of suffrage organizations that will furnish marching contingents to the parade.

The banner parade is given under the direction of the Empire State campaign committee, and Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse is the chairman in charge of it.

If you have never seen one of the monster suffrage parades, for which New York has become famous, this may be your last opportunity. On Nov. 2 suffragists, be it remembered, expect to win the goal toward which they have been marching for so long.

JOTTINGS AND JOLTINGS.

Anti-suffrage Jottings No. 15.

Woman suffrage has not saved states and cities from falling into ill repute as badly governed. Experience disappoints expectations of great political uplift as the result of woman suffrage.

Anti-suffrage Jottings No. 23.

Man suffrage has not saved states and cities from falling into ill repute as badly governed. Notice New York city's bebossed situation. Remember Massachusetts' industrial crises. Consider Pennsylvania's record. Ask yourself if New Jersey has been famed for political uplift. Experience disappoints expectations of great political uplift as the result of man suffrage. But, for all that, voting is the best means of governing as yet discovered, and women mean to come in on it.

Was Asleep In Buggy.

McKinney, Tex.—Bart Hodge of Longneck, seven miles from here, tells an unusual story of how his six-year-old daughter was lost. While hitching up to drive to McKinney, Hodge heard his wife calling the child, but drove away, not suspecting that the girl was out of sight. Meanwhile for two hours Mrs. Hodge searched and neighbors assisted. When Hodge arrived at McKinney the daughter crawled out from under his buggy seat. She had been asleep.

FORESTS AND MOISTURE.

Trees Conserve Water, Aid Percolation and Retard Evaporation.

Trees drink in and transpire an enormous quantity of water. This giving off tempers the dryness of the nearby atmosphere. Moisture bearing currents of air are caught by forest areas as they are not by the heated plains. Local showers may thus become more frequent where trees abound, or at least the availability of whatever rain may fall is increased for the locality by forest growths.

Foliage, twigs and branches break the fall of the raindrops. So does the litter on the forest floor. Hence the soil under this cover is not compacted as in the open field, but is kept loose and granular, so water can readily penetrate and percolate. The water reaches the ground more slowly, dripping gradually from the leaves, branches and trunks, and thus more time is allowed for it to sink into the soil and appear again in springs or subsoil moisture lower down.

In forests there is much less evaporation of moisture than in the open country because sun and wind do not have such free play. It is estimated that forests have from 50 to 60 per cent of water supply more than the open fields because of increased percolation and decreased evaporation.—Country Gentleman.

The First Cannon.

The first cannon was carried by soldiers, and one man held it in both hands while the other fired it.

Tainted Money.

Eugene was not accustomed to receiving sums of money coins of a larger denomination than the nickel, and pennies were more familiar. A wealthy relative who was visiting the family and wished to talk over subjects that were not for young ears gave him a quarter and bade him go downtown and spend it. His eyes shone. In the three and a half years of his life he had never had so much money. Then craft entered into his soul. "If I take the money do I have to stay out a long time?" he inquired. On being told that this was expected of him he sadly but firmly returned the money and kept his freedom of action.—New York Herald.

Bright Youngster.

"I've been a good boy today, haven't I, mamma?" asked the pride of the household.

"Yes, Richard. You've been a very good boy indeed."

"Aren't you going to call papa up on the phone and tell him about it?"

"Why, no; I haven't thought of it," replied his mother. "Don't you think it will be time enough to tell him when he comes home?"

"Well," said the youngster, "he might want to buy me some candy or something for being good, and I thought we might save him the trouble of going out for it after he gets in the house."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Combs.

That combs are of ancient origin is proved by the fact that they were found in the ruins of Pompeii.

Is This Good Business?

$5,000 of uncollected taxes, all over two years old were on the City's books January first, 1915, and meanwhile the city was borrowing money to meet expenses.

Do You Conduct Your Business in That Manner?

NOW READ THE STORY

City Chamberlain Deuel furnished lists of unpaid taxes to the City Legal Department, and the Department "lost" them. After about four weeks Deuel sent another list, and about six weeks after that the Legal Department reported that it had been

SPECIAL REGISTRATION TUESDAY, SEPT. 14

Some confusion exists in the minds of the voters in regard to the registration for the Special Election.

ONLY THOSE WHO HAVE MOVED SINCE LAST ELECTION DAY AND THOSE WHO HAVE NOT REGISTERED, ARE REQUIRED TO REGISTER AT THIS SPECIAL REGISTRATION ON SEPTEMBER 14th.

All other registered voters, if they still reside at the places from which they registered last year, may vote on September 17th without further registration.

The instructions received, by City Clerk Scudder, from Albany are very definite in this respect. They are as follows:

"Special Registration, Tuesday, September 14th, 1915, 7 a. m. to 10 p. m., is hereby designated registration day for electors who are not registered in the district in which they reside and who desire to vote at the Special Election to be held September 17th.

BROOKS MAKES STRONG MAN

Prohis Place Ex-Grocer at Head of City Ticket—Should Draw Support From Other Lines.

James H. Brooks of East Broadway will head the city Prohibition ticket this fall, according to the petitions filed by the city committee in Oswego Tuesday. Mr. Brooks is a well known grocer, has many friends and will poll a heavy vote on his popularity, it is predicted. For many years he was a strong Democrat and held several offices under the village government. In view of the unsettled conditions here politically, his friends believe he will make a strong run for the office and he has already received assurances of support from many prominent men of other political opinions.

The Prohibitionists have nominated John W. Distin of the West Side for Alderman, and predict his re-election by a large majority. They also hope to elect Edgar J. Penfield as Alderman from the Fourth.

The complete party ticket filed follows:

Mayor, James H. Brooks; supervisor, First and Sixth wards, Benjamin J. Ingersoll; supervisor, Second and Third wards, George W. Flint; supervisor, Fourth and Fifth wards, George A. Rappole; aldermen, First ward, John W. Distin; alderman, Second ward, Merritt W. Milks; alderman, Third ward, William Baggs; alderman Fourth ward, Edgar J. Penfield; alderman, Fifth ward, James Van Alstine; alderman, Sixth ward, Alva H. Bateman.

Committeemen: George T. Carner, Floyd T. Fox, Clay A. Beckwith, Seymour Halstead, C. W. Hobble, William H. Wells and Edward G. Wells.

TRADE DIVISION WANTS FULTON-HANNIBAL BUS

The Retail Trade Division of the Chamber of Commerce met this morning at headquarters. The division is considering the establishment of a bus line between this city and Hannibal.

WHERE AN OBSTRUCTION CEASES TO BE A BARRIER

In spite of the barricade erected by the contractors, several motorists have persisted in driving upon the newly-laid brick at the intersection of First and Oneida sts. This morning Patrolman Fox, on traffic post at that point, was obliged to order three or four drivers to back off the paving. Most of the men were strangers in the city and, seeing the opening left for the passage of the trolley car, drove on the pavement, unaware that it had not been opened for traffic.

The work on the knoll at the corner of North First st. and Oneida st. is progressing rapidly and the contractors expect to strat the concrete foundation for the paving in that quarter tomorrow. The section now used for traffic on the south and west sides of the trolley tracks will be the last to be completed.

CORN ROASTING BECOMES POPULAR ON THE HILL

Thirty young people, including a number of visitors from other cities, enjoyed a corn roast last night on Stand-pipe hill on East Broadway. The affair was arranged by Miss Eryma Paige and Miss Hennessy.

Among those present were Miss Gertrude Farrell, formerly of this city, but now of Syracuse; Miss Marie Haussler, Miss Irene Abert, Miss Alma Becker, Miss Ruth Hart and Miss Margaret Beebe, all of Baldwinsville; Fred Pulver of Baldwinsville, Herbert Hill of Albany, Charles Love, Robert Crockett and many other young people of this city.

WOODMEN LISTEN TO LECTURE ON HOLLAND

Warner S. Gardner, district superintendent of public schools, made an eloquent and interesting address last night to the Modern Woodmen of America membership. His subject was Holland and he used effectively a series of lantern slides which showed the country and its people. Prior to the lecture Joe Colicino of 406 West 2nd st., secured a mission rocking chair, the prize being won in a contest.

Eight applications for membership in the lodge were acted upon.

MR. E. R. REDHEAD AT MINETTO MEETING

At Tuesday night's group conference held in the Minetto M. E. church, Mr. E. R. Redhead of this city made an address on the relation of the permanent fund to the efficiency of the church. The object of the meeting was to arouse interest in the work of obtaining a permanent fund for the relief of retired ministers. The conference is divided into districts and it was the Oswego district which met last evening. The Rev. William H. English of Trinity M. E. church, is the chairman of the district. The Methodist churches in this city, Minetto, Oswego Center, Hannibal, Scriba were represented.

JOHNSTON—HILLICK.

The best wishes of a large circle of social and business friends of Mrs. R. A. Johnston accompany the young lady who was until Tuesday Miss Clare Hillick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Hillick.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnston were married at Minetto, being attended by Mr. and Mrs. Edward Clohessey, who are Mrs. Johnston's brother and sister. Only the immediate relatives and friends of the couple were present. Following the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Johnston held a reception at the Clohessey home. At the conclusion of a honeymoon trip spent touring northern New York resorts Mr. and Mrs. Johnston will take up their residence in Tilbury, Ont., where the groom is engaged in a mercantile business.

In Mrs. Johnston the L. P. Smith company loses an esteemed and faithful employe.

CANDIDATES NOW IN THE RING

Victor C. Lewis and John Boland's Names Appear in List With Other Men Seeking Office.

Oswego is not the only place in this county where political affairs resemble a hashed condition, as a glance at the list of names of men of this city whose petitions have been filed with the election commissioners.

Victor C. Lewis is destined to head the Republican ticket as candidate for Mayor, and John E. Boland, another tobacco dealer, has cast his bait for Democracy's preference. The other Democratic candidates are:

Aldermen—First ward, George McKay Second ward, W. J. Sullivan; Third ward, Edward J. McCale; Fourth and Fifth wards, A. N. Permiter.

At the last hour for filing petitions the following were sent in:

Aldermen—First ward, John W. Distin; Third ward, William Bidwell; Fourth ward, C. M. Allan, Jr.; Fifth ward, Frank Quirk; Sixth ward, Frank Van Valkenburg.

Supervisor—First and Sixth wards, Rexford Carvey; Fourth and Fifth wards, George H. Fuller.

One of the largest petitions filed was that of Thaddeus C. Sweet as Republican candidate for member of assembly.

The petitions for the American party endorsement of Mr. Dings and other candidates contained two names, the Independence League two and the Socialist ticket one name. On many of the petitions for nomination for county committeemen on the Progressive party ticket the committeeman is the only one that has signed.

Supervisors—First and Sixth wards, Benjamin J. Ingersoll; Second and Third wards, Wade E. Gayer; Fourth and Fifth wards, G. A. Rappole.

Aldermen—Second ward, Otto Malone; Third ward, Edwin T. Babcock; Fourth ward, George Smith; Fifth ward, Louis W. Emerick.

County Committee—Albion, Frank W. Fenton, Hastings, Second district, C. H. Courbat; Mexico, First district, W. L. Buck; Second district, C. W. House; Third district, C. E. Crosier; Orwell, Thomas Jeanes; Oswego Town, First district, Clifton Lamb; Second district, Rufus Hawkins; Frank E. Rounds; Richland, First district, Ansel W. Brown; Third district, Fred L. Spicer; Sandy Creek, First district, P. G. Hydron; Second district, F. Dudley Corse; Schroeppel, First district, A. P. Merriam; Second district, J. Clifton Larkin; Scriba, First district, W. J. Capston; Second district, David Enos; Volney, First district, A. K. Rowlinson; Second district, r Fed Sykes; Williamstown, Henry A. White; Fulton, First ward, Second district, C. R. Dines, Charles E. Stewart; Second ward, First district, William Osborne; Second district, J. W. Stevenson; Third ward, First district, C. H. Hulett; Second district, Frank H. Rumsey; Fourth ward, Robert L. Lake, Harry C. Webb; Fifth ward, First district, John A. Bort, W. Lawson Woodbury; Second district, Fred E. Wolcott; Sixth ward, First district, C. J. Brewer; Second district, H. P. Allen; Oswego City, First ward, Second district, James H. Dietz; Second ward, S. J. Vandish; Eighth ward, First district, Ray McCarthy.

STEVENSON'S MARE WINS STRAIGHT HEATS

With George Dubois at the ribbons, Florence L., owned by John W. Stevenson, romped away with three straight heats in the 2:24 trot and pace at the Boonville fair yesterday and won first money in a purse of $400. The local horse also won the 2:28 event at the Oswego county fair by a large margin. Florence L. duplicated her local performance yesterday and Dubois was never obliged to drive her to her limit. Her owner made the trip to the fair in his car, and several other local turf enthusiasts were present to see the races, the majority of the Fulton contingent making the trip by automobile.

Joe Patchen III, owned by Weaver & Jones of Canastota, who vanquished Michigan King of the Stevenson stable at the local fair, won the 2:14 pace at Watertown yesterday in three straight heats.

OSWEGO HAD NEAR CLOUDBURST YESTERDAY

Oswego, Sept. 9.—At 2:30 this afternoon there was a rainfall that came near being a cloudburst, 1.11 inches of rain falling in less than twenty minutes. It was accompanied by a brisk breeze and awnings and store signs suffered considerable damage. A number of cellars in downtown stores were flooded and thel oss will be heavy, particularly in the Clancy store, which suffered most.

Three Fords were blown loose during the storm, that owned by Jorn Graveley getting as far as the middle of the road; one belonging to Harry Callison moving about half a block before hitting a curb, and one owned by E. D. Trimble of Palermo smashing into a car owend by F. B. Treadwell and amputating a mudguard. A few more cloudbursts, and an anchor will have to be added to the equipment of local car owners.

More of the pavement in West Bridge and Oneida streets was ripped out and carried down to Bridge st. The window in the east side store of Whelan & Company was smashed and a show case in front of Wells & Coverly's store was wrecked.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom—Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 8.—Amendments to the Constitution aimed to remove the flaws in the present article on taxation, as adopted by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention, straighten out, in the opinion of many experts upon the subject, knotted ends which have long been an impediment to the State Department of taxation and to a certain class of taxpayers as well.

Among the most important changes the adoption by the people of the proposition accepted by the Constitutional Convention would bring about include the provision that no contracts shall be made for the exemption of real property perpetually.

It is also provided in the amended article, that in order for the legislature to grant future exemptions from taxation, two-thirds of the members shall vote. At present a majority vote suffices.

A uniform system of taxation is prescribed, centralizing the power to assess, the legislature having been given the power to provide for the supervision, review and equalization of assessments.

Local assessors are given additional authority as to the assessment of real property, but are deprived of certain of their authority as to the assessment of personal property.

Another salient point of the amended article on taxation is that the legislature is given authority to provide for the assessment by state authorities of all property of designated classes of public service corporations.

The amended article on taxation to be submitted to the people reads: "The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away, except as to the securities of the state or a civil division thereof. Hereafter no exemption from taxation shall be granted except by general laws and upon the affirmative vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house.

"Taxes shall be imposed by general laws and for public purposes only. The legislature shall prescribe how taxable subjects shall be assessed and provide for officers to execute laws relating to the assessment and collection of taxes, any provision of section Two or Article Ten notwithstanding. The legislature shall provide for the supervision, review and equalization of assessments.

"For the assessment of real property, heretofore locally assessed, the legislature shall establish tax districts, none of which, unless it be a city, shall embrace more than one county. The assessors therein shall be elected by the electors of such districts or appointed by such authorities thereof as shall be designated by law. The legislature may provide that the assessment roll of each larger district shall serve for all the lesser tax districts within its boundaries. No such tax district larger than a town, except a city, shall be established until the law providing therefor shall have been adopted by a vote of a majority of the people voting thereon in such proposed district at an election for which provision shall be made by law. The legislature may, however, provide for the assessment by state authorities of all property of designated classes of public service corporations."

Albany, Sept. 9.—Since in the past there has been considerable difficulty in securing a quorum and various questions have been raised as to what constituted a quorum, the delegates to the Constitutional Convention devoted much time to the subject and finally adopted an amendment to Section 10, Article Three of the State Constitution, which section and article has to do with the question of quorum.

It has been frequently the case when legislation has been retarded to advance and sometimes pass bills when as a matter of fact there has not been a quorum present. In the majority of thesec ases, however, the measures advanced and finally disposed of have been of such a character that no objection was raised when they were taken up. Frequently, also, objection has been raised and it then became necessary to determine if a quorum was actually present if the question of no quorum were raised.

During the proceedings surrounding the impeachment of William Sulzer, the question of no quorum was raised by the attorneys for Sulzer and an affidavit count was taken which convinced them that there had not been a quorum present, or a majority of the members. The books of the Assembly Clerk showed that there had been a quorum and the journal did not set forth the fact that the minutes of the previous meeting had been objected to. This fact in the eyes of the court established the point. The Clerk of the Assembly being the official of record, his record had to stand and the Sulzer attorneys lost their point.

The exact language, showing how the section and article under consideration has been amended follows:

"A majority of the members elected to each house shall constitute a quorum to do business. Each house shall determine the rules of its own proceedings and be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members and shall choose its own officers.

"The Senate shall choose a temporary president. The Assembly shall choose a speaker. If the Lieutenant-Governor become Governor, the temporary president shall become lieutenant-governor for the residue of the term. If the lieutenant-governor be impeached or be unable to discharge the duties of the office or be acting governor, the temporary president shall act as lieutenant-governor during such impeachment or inability or while the lieutenant-governor is acting governor. If the lieutenant-governor refuse ot act as president or be absent from the chair, the temporary president shall preside. If the speaker of the Assembly be unable to perform the duties of the office or be acting governor, the Assembly may choose a temporary speaker who shall act as speaker during such disability or while the speaker is acting governor or until a speaker is chosen.",

Inasmuch as everything that is done in either house of the legislature depends upon the action of the quorum, it can be readily seen that hereafter there should be no possible doubt as to what shall constitute a quorum. The writing into the Constitution of the above provision will remove all doubts as to what a quorum shall consist of, the delegates of the Constitutional Convention declare.

Like all of the proposed amendments adopted while the delegates were in session, the above proposition must be acted upon by the people before it becomes operative and a part of the amended Constitution.

PENSION FUND FOR METHODIST CLERGYMEN

The pension idea, which is rapidly taking form in corporations, has entered the religious denominations in earnest. The churches of the country are raising various funds, amounting to sixty-five millions, to provide for those who have given life service to work of the ministry and have reached the place in life where because of age and health they cannot longer continue the active work.

The Methodist Episcopal church found the amount necessary for it to reach is ten millions.

The list of pensioners average about 80, including retired preachers, widows of preachers, and their orphans who are under 16 years old. The $400,000 is to be invested and interest used within this particular conference. Already $150,000 has been received in cash and bona fide pledges. There remains to be secured yet a quarter of a million. To accomplish this stupendous task of securing such an amount the churches and ther pastors have adopted large and comprehensive methods.

An advertising campaign involving the church press, descriptive pamphlets reaching into the tens of thousands, the co-operation of local newspapers and pulpit publicity has begun. This will be followed by the exchange of every pastor in one-fourth of the conference on a given Sunday. The next Sunday each pastor will present the cause in his own church and receive subscriptions.

A trial subscription for The Evening Times costs little and gives you much in return. It is the people's paper. adv

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE

News Mostly of a Political Nature From the Nation's Seat of Government for Times' Readers.

Washington, Sept. 9.—(Special.) The President has ordered the Interstate Commission to investigate the transportation facilities and rates between this country and foreign nations. He expects to use the information in his renewed fight for a government-owned merchant marine. There is a strong legal questions as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has a right to inquire into the necessity for the governmental purchase, financing or operation of a merchant marine.

But, whether the action is legal or not, it goes to show the dogged persistence of the President. The ship purchase bill was never demanded by any party platform, it never enjoyed the favor of any considerable group of people, it was brought forward as a personal scheme of the Presidtn and McAdoo, and by Presidential pressure it was forced through one branch of Congress, only to meet defeat in the Senate through the courageous resistance of the Republican minority, aided by a few rational-minded Democrats. Since the business men of the country—in whose interests the President assumes to be acting—have declared emphatically in opposition to the scheme.

Yet the President persists; and he intends to employ the power and influence and activities of any governmental agency in his attempt to force this obnoxious measure through Congress.

In the first two months of the present fiscal year, the administration has incurred a deficit of $29,217,775. The net balance in the treasury on August 30 was $52,723,742, as compared with a balance of $127,211,118 on the same date two years ago when Republican revenue laws and appropriations were in effect.

The Boston Herald says that from the advocacy of some issues President Wilson is estooped by party history or tradition. It will be news to the American people that party history or tradition or party pledges or personal promises can estop President Wilson from anything. During his campaign did he not personally promise support of free tolls for American coastwise shipping through the Canal and also assure the people of the country that "pitiless publicity" would be his policy in administration? Did those promises estop him from pursuing a directly opposite course? Did not his party platform promise economy and maintenance of the merit system in the civil service? Were not both of these pledges broken with his approval? When personal and party pledges on which the ink is scarcely dry do not estop President Wilson, what peculiar power can there be in party history and tradition to bar him from changing his attitude over night on any and all subjects according to his varying moods or the shifting of the weather vane?

UNEMPLOYMENT STILL EXISTS

Chicago, Sept. 9.—(Special.) When the Republicans made the tariff, unemployment ando ther national questions, an issue in the mayoralty campaign of last spring. The highbrow element thought it was too high. But the people understood and Mayor Thompson was swept into office by 150,000 majority.

Now everybody is coming to understand that a freetrade tariff—with its accompaniment of shortened hours, curtailed wages or lack of employment altogether—has a distinct bearing upon municipal affairs; and the most emphatic evidence of this is found in the enormously increased demands upon the municipal and county treasuries for the support or assistance of dependents or quasi-dependents.

According to thefi gures of the poor relief department of the county, the department in February of the present year, fed as many people as live in Springfield, Ill., the third largest city of the state. Last year the county agent aided directly 100,000 persons. This year the estimate is that 200,000, or twice the number cared for last year, will be fed, clothed, and warmed at the expense of the taxpayers. Consequently more taxes will have to be collected to pay the increased bill.

Cook county's grand total for charitable purposes last year was $2,278,540.

If the population provided for at the county hospital and Oak Forest, together with one-half of the 18,208 patients visited at their homes by the county agent's physicians, and who do not receive other assistance, and also the 2,588 non-residents and aliens given temporary assistance in 1914, are added to those directly assisted, it is estimated that in round figures the actual total of those assisted will come close to 125,000, and exceed the combined population of Peoria and Spring field. This population represents persons cared for by the institutions organized and operated under the pauper act; that is, poor relief department, county hospital and infirmary, including the tuberculosis hospital at Oak Forest.

These figures do not indicate the 16,268 patients treated at dispensaries operated in connection with the county hospital, nor the 5,788 children cared for by the juvenile court which are also poverty's contribution to the charity service of Cook county.

In other words, thea pplication of Democratic policies in the nation—as shown by the Underwood tariff and its effects—has just about doubled the number of people who cannot earn a whole living in Chicago.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in ——

PROLOGUE.

Did you ever hear of a successful combination of love and business? Probably not. Well, here is the opportunity to learn just how it can be done. The greatest force in modern commercial life has undoubtedly been shown to be effective advertising, and in this interesting narrative you will see how this fact comes into operation. Based on one of the most popular plays of the year, this story will be read with interest by the business man, the ambitious youth and the trustful young girl who looks at life with more or less of perplexity. It is a story that reveals how the spirit of hope overcomes the deepest despair, even when the outlook is most disheartening. It combines the practical with the sentimental affairs of business and home life and at the same time running through it is a vein of humor irresistible in its appeal. The characters are true to life, and the net result of their activities is that you should never acknowledge defeat while you have a breath to breathe.

CHAPTER I.

A Rich Man's Son.

OLD CYRUS MARTIN, the soap king, sat in his library in no very contented frame of mind. There was a thorn in his flesh, and he began to feel it more and more. It was not an agreeable sensation, a thorn in the flesh, for a soap king whose cuticle was not accustomed to it.

He traced it more or less vaguely to his meeting that morning with his old friend and rival in the soap business, John Clark. They had fallen in with each other, as often happened, at the Directors' club about lunch time and had one of their half friendly, half hostile chats together. And to make a long story short, Martin had bet Clark $30,000 that his son, Rodney Martin, would be making more money in a year's time than Clark's son Ellery. As neither boy had ever made a penny in his life, unless betting on a football game or winning a jackpot could be called making money, there was a fairly sporty flavor to the bargain.

The bits of business lore and anecdotes of sagacity and trade that Clark represented as coming from the precocious lips of the marvelous Ellery had finally goaded old Martin into fury. He at least knew that Rodney was a nincompoop in business, if he was his son; he had no illusions about that. But the comparisons had reached a point finally beyond which he would not let them proceed unchallenged, and so he had made his ridiculous wager and must abide by it. The prospect of turning over $30,000 to John Clark in a year's time and admitting Rodney's incompetence to boot was devilish.

What was the matter with rich men's sons anyway? thought Cyrus Martin. Rodney's father had not spoiled him, his father's conscience was clear on that point at least. Perhaps he had not spoiled him enough, his mother used to think so. Perhaps his mother, had she lived, with that nervous way she had of prodding people on, would have been of benefit when mere sternness had failed.

The boy had spent more money in college each year than the sum total of his father's and mother's expenses during the first childless years of their married life; not necessarily on fast living, his father was reasonably sure of that, but for luxuries and gewgaws at which young men in the old days would have turned up their noses. Rodney's father had not gone to college himself, though his parents could have sent him. He was not altogether a self made man. His own father, Rodney's grandfather, a country banker in Connecticut, had left him the heritage of a modest fortune and thrifty habits, and in the soap king's mind now these seemed more to be thankful for than half a dozen college professors and their snap courses. Yet there was nothing particular the matter with Rodney's inheritance and environment, there was just something lacking in the boy himself.

Compare Rodney, for instance, with young Rufus Plodman, son of old Elihu Plodman of the State Wire and Iron works. Rufus was one of the liveliest young men in the business world, married to a nice wife and with a family growing up already. His name was beginning to be mentioned more and more. Then there was Chauncey Brinkhurst, who took the burden of the Excelsior National bank almost entirely off old Brinkhurst's shoulders, and a good thing for the depositors too. There was even Will J. Robinson, Jr., of the Pine Hill Dye Works company, who had brought in orders that set the concern on its feet, there was good reason to believe, in just the nick of time. Compare all these and a good few others with his own young hopeful, and which name got the best of it?

The boy was attractive, too; his father had always liked him. Perhaps that was one of the chief troubles. Even as a little child he had never flown into tempers or had hateful ways. His own winning and noncombative disposition had been the chief means, no doubt, of warding off the disciplines of life. He was amiable and good looking in an unobtrusive way, and everybody liked him. To look at him impartially you would not have thought he lacked character, unless you yielded too much to your prejudice against a slight lisp and an otherwise somewhat finicky way of talking. He did not run into debt now, nor overdraw his allowance, or at any rate not very much; he had never done so much, and in college he had got fairly good marks, as nearly as his father could make out, and had won his degree of A. B. without too obvious difficulty. Didn't the precious sheepskin hang framed on the wall of his room, surrounded by a veritable picture gallery of college glee clubs and elevens and nines? Cyrus Martin had been credibly informed that you could not actually graduate from Harvard or Yale or Princeton without some portion of mentality. Where did it show itself in Rodney? As a boy he had had his flashes of cleverness and wit; what propensity had been revealed in them? Ransacking his memories, old Martin could not remember what they were; had they been merely the subjective readings of fond parents minds? Why was Rodney so different from old Clark's boy Ellery?

Well, perhaps Clark was a good deal of a bluffer in this instance. Martin must call the bluff and win out somehow in the matter of this bet, or his life would not be worth living.

He rang the bell sharply for Johnson, his butler, prepared to have a pretty sharp twinge of gout if the summons was not promptly answered?

"Any one call this afternoon, Johnson?" he asked, when that silent footed dignitary appeared.

Johnson took a silver tray from the table near the hall door and glanced downward at it stiffly.

"The Countess de Beaurien," he said impassively.

"Who's she?" asked Mr. Martin.

"I don't know, sir. She couldn't speak a word of anything but French.

Why Was Rodney So Different From Old Clark's Boy Ellery?

Marie was off today, sir, and nobody else could get anything out of her. She claims she had a letter of introduction to you from your Paris partner, M. Rivard."

"Has Rivard lost his mind?" muttered Martin. "Was she old or young or pretty or what?"

"I couldn't say, sir. You can't sometimes always tell with them French ladies, sir."

"A letter from Rivard?" muttered Martin. "I don't believe it. He's never given any one a letter to me without tipping me off. Johnson, hand me that fat red book in the lower right hand corner there."

Johnson did so, and Mr. Martin began turning over the leaves rapidly, observing:

"You know, Johnson, it's easier to read French than to speak it."

"So I understand, sir," returned the butler.

"Beauclair, Beauville—oh, here she is, Beaurien. No, she is not. A fake, Johnson, just as I supposed. The Countess de Beaurien is seventy years old, and at her death the title becomes extinct. Was the lady this afternoon as old as seventy, Johnson?"

"Oh, no, sir. Not at all, sir."

"Are you sure she asked for me and not Mr. Rodney?"

"Quite sure, sir. Miss Grayson was here, sir, and can tell you. We had a time of it."

"Some lady going into business to do America or the Americans," was Mr. Martin's inward comment. "Anybody else?" he added aloud.

"Yes, sir," said Johnson; "Mrs. Cheysemore. She left the blank for the Y. M. C. A. subscription."

"I hope you remember that I'm always out for her, Johnson."

Mr. Martin thought it really a little shameful how many times this pious lady came to see him.

"And who else? Give me that tray."

Mr. Martin took the salver and peered beneath the rims of his glasses at the bits of pasteboard. "Ambrose Peale," he read, "press representative 'Belle of of Broadway' company."

"Now who was that, Johnson?"

"He was calling on Mr. Rodney, sir," said Johnson. "He's been here several times, but never left his card before."

A press agent from a Broadway show after Rodney? The young man's father groaned inwardly. "Oh, Lord," he thought, "what next?" Visions of breach of promise, of blackbird dinners, or even elopements, flashed through his mind. This settled it. Rodney simply must be anchored somehow.

"Is Mr. Rodney in, Johnson?" was the next inquiry.

"No, sir. Not now, sir."

"Do you know where he is now?"

"From 1 to 2 he was at a downtown restaurant at lunch, sir. From 2:30 to 3 he was at the horse auction company looking at a new hunter, sir. From 4 to 5 he's at the Municipal club, sir."

"Good heavens, Johnson, how do you know all that?" exclaimed Mr. Martin.

"Because he left the telephone numbers, sir, and I was to let him know if Miss Grayson came in, sir."

"And has she been here, Miss Grayson?"

"Yes, sir; she's been here since 4 o'clock, sir, doing some typing. She's still waiting for you."

"Why the devil didn't you say so, then?"

"I was coming to it presently, sir."

"Tell her to come in, then, to the library. And, Johnson, don't you bother to ring up and tell Mr. Rodney anything, do you understand?"

"Yes, sir. Nothing, sir."

It was really faithless of Johnson, the soap king thought, to betray Rodney's well laid plans, but Rodney's father had plans of his own in frustrating them. Let that silly ass Johnson think what he had a mind to. He didn't want Mary Grayson for himself, and he didn't care if she was poor. She came of good stock—he had known her mother—and there could be many a worse fate for Rodney than being caught in her net. He was not sure, in point of fact, if the girl wasn't spreading her nets quietly. The old man was a shrewd judge of character, and there was an idea taking shape in the back of his mind that Mary Grayson might help him earn that $30,000.

Mary Grayson! Well, what made young men work? Love, sometimes, and poverty and necessity. The first might stir Rodney up, if not the second and third. But why not all three?

"She stoops to conquer," he muttered to himself. To tell the truth he had heard this phrase all his life without really taking in the meaning of it. Now he had seen the old farce comedy prettily played not long ago, and the hackneyed title of it had been ringing in his ears with rather a new meaning. Rodney might be made to stoop to be conquered—to conquer himself and his laziness of a rich man's son. On Mary Grayson's part it was not really stooping if you considered Rodney's mentality and character. He admitted it sourly. If Rodney could find an incentive in Mary Grayson, the stenographer, what did old man Martin care? He knew her for a good girl, as she was a pretty one, and nicer in speech and manners than some of the widows who made heavy eyes at him from the windows of their limousines. Lots of old fellows, he thought, might feel like making up to Mary themselves. And why not? Well, one reason for Cyrus Martin was that he had known her mother. Besides—

"Did you want me, Mr. Martin?"

SALAD Dressing to Keep In the Refrigerator. — The ingredients needed for this old time recipe are; One tablespoonful of mustard, one scant tablespoonful of salt, one cupful of cream (or milk), one tablespoonful of sugar, three eggs, one-half of a scant cupful of melted butter and one cupful of vinegar. Mix the mustard, salt and vinegar. Then add the yolks of the eggs, beaten thoroughly, then the butter, beating all the time. Add the cream, then the beaten whites of eggs and, lastly, the vinegar. Cook in a double boiler until the mixture thickens. This will keep a long time if kept in a covered jar in the refrigerator.

Cold Chicken Bouillon. — Get good roasting chickens and remove skin and fat when cleaning them. Put them on in cold water, adding at the same time one leek to each chicken; two tender carrots, one onion and a sprig of parsley. Let the chicken barely simmer until it falls to rags. Take it off the fire, remove superfluous grease and then strain. Clarify the bouillon with the whites and shells of two eggs and then strain again. Put on the ice until needed and serve in bouillon cups.

Inexpensive Peach Ice Cream.—Stir into a quart of boiling water a level tablespoon of flour, rubbed smooth, in a little cold milk, add the yolks of two well beaten eggs, strained. Stir carefully, cooking only a few minutes; add one cupful of sugar. Beat the whites to a stiff froth and stir them into the custard after taking from the fire. This gives a creamy taste and is an improvement when cooled. Add one-half of a pint of thick cream with the same measure of sifted peach pulp, with a little granulated sugar.

THE VALUE OF SALT IN THE BATHROOM.

Salt is not only a necessity in the kitchen, but it will work wonders in the bathroom. It is the cheapest and best of nerve tonics and the finest of skin lotions. Salt is to beauty in the bathroom just what it is to food in the kitchen. In fact, it is the solution offered by nature to most of our beauty and health queries.

Every one has heard of the splendid strengthening effects of salt water bathing, but few think of taking salt water baths in their own tubs. Sea salt can be bought in any drug store, and a large bag should be kept on hand in the bathroom.

When you come home tired out and nervous try a salt bath. You will find it invaluable for weakness and nervousness, and you will find that a month of the home salt bath treatment will take away all traces of that "tired feeling." In fact, the woman who bathes in salt water two or three times a week feels too vigorous and strong ever to know that tired sensation.

If the skin on the face or throat is flabby you will find a salt massage of the greatest benefit. This will make the skin firm and strong. Just take a half handful of salt and rub it into the skin—not too hard, for the roughness of the salt will redden and irritate the flesh, but gently and evenly. After a soft but thorough salt massage wash the face off with cold water.

The action of the salt, whether used dry or in the bath, is to enliven the circulation and to stimulate the nerves. This in turn makes the skin clearer, the color better and the general surface firmer and smoother.

Salt as a tooth powder is also at its best, for it whitens the teeth and hardens the gums.

When salt is such an aid to health and beauty and is so very cheap every bathroom should hold it.

FALL CANNING.

Practical Hints on How to Preserve Fresh Fruits.

Generally speaking, preserving means the cooking of fruits in an equal weight of sugar, long enough for the fruit to keep without being air tight. Canning may be done with little or no sugar and just enough cooking to thoroughly heat the fruit, but air must be excluded.

The same general directions apply to each process.

Needed Articles.—Granite or porcelain lined kettles or stewpans, with bales or handles and lips for convenience in pouring.

Perhaps the two quart size is most used, but if one can afford it several sizes will be found very convenient.

A small, sharp steel paring knife or, better still, a silver plated fruit knife ground down to a fine edge, expressly for fruit paring. Other necessary articles — wooden spoons — some with slits, a wire spoon, silver spoons, large and small, a skewer, scales for weighing, a hair sieve, a tin strainer and a supply of cheesecloth.

Preparation.—Observe utmost cleanliness of hands, utensils and fruit. Avoid anything that tends to lessen color or flavor. Use only sound fruits and vegetables. Clean and scald jars and covers. Use new rubbers every season.

Blackberries.—Half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Currants.—Three-fourths cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Huckleberries.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Pineapples.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Pears.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Apricots.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil five minutes.

Peaches.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Cranberries.—One cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil forty-five minutes.

Crabapples. — Three-fourths cupful sugar to each pint, boil thirty minutes.

How to Utilize Odd Bits of Soap You Have Saved.

Save the odd bits of toilet soap, the more expensive and highly perfumed ones as well as the ivory. When you have a good collection let them simmer in a little water on the back of the stove. When quite dissolved add violet water or any desired perfume and a few drops of lemon juice. Pour into desired mold and allow to harden. A delightful perfumed soap will be the result. Treat all bits of yellow common kitchen soap by themselves. You will be surprised to see how much good soap you would have wasted had you thrown away the useless bits.

How to Cure Freckles and Not Injure Skin.

Many women acquire what are called summer freckles that appear almost immediately on exposure to the sun and disappear a little while after the victim stays in the house.

The best treatment for these summer freckles is to bathe them frequently with pure soap and water, using a good face brush and rubbing the freckles until they are almost irritated. This friction excites the circulation beneath the skin. A good cold cream should be applied after the scrubbing.

BELTED AND POCKETED IN LATEST STYLE.

Junior frock of cotton ratine. The blouse has long shoulders and a panel front, while the neck is finished with a Quaker collar.

The dominant features of many of the modes for grownups are reflected in this smart little frock of cotton ratine, which has a full skirt, belted middy blouse, with shoulder yoke and Quaker collar. A novel touch may be imparted to the frock by belt, collar and pockets of colored linen. If the ratine is 36 inches wide 3¾ yards will be sufficient to reproduce the dress, in medium size.

Steady application to the work should result in the making of this design in a day, with practically no difficulty. Beginning with the blouse, the first step is to turn under the edge of the front on slot perforations. Next, lap on side front to line of small "o" perforations, with notches even. The stitching should be about 1¼ inches from the folded edge and the edges to the left of the center-front left free for closing. After this gather upper edge of side front between double "TT" perforations. Close under-arm and shoulder seams as notched. Turn hem at lower edge on small "o" perforations. Face collar and collarband and join as notched. Large "O" perforation in collarband indicates center-front. Sew to neck as notched.

When cutting out the blouse the line of small "o" perforations which appear in the pattern can be traced on the material, so that when the pockets are adjusted they will be so placed that the upper edge of pocket will be along this line. The front of the pocket is indicated by large "O" perforations.

Next match the center-back of the belt with the center-back of the blouse so that they will be even, then adjust the belt to position, with the upper edge of belt at large "O" perforation in back.

Close the sleeve seam as notched, then sew in armhole, matching notches and easing in any fulness.

The skirt is attached to an underbody the lower edge of the front of which is pleated by placing "T" on corresponding small "o" perforation. Close under-arm and shoulder seams as notched, turn hem in back at notches. Lap right back on left, centers even (large "O" perforations indicate center-back); stitch lower edges together.

Join skirt gores as notched; close back seam from large "O" perforation to lower edge; finish edges above for placket. Turn hem at lower edge on small "o" perforations; gather upper edge between double "TT" perforations. Sew to lower edge of underbody, center-fronts and center-backs even, side seam at under-arm seam.

A string tie of velvet lends dash to the collar.

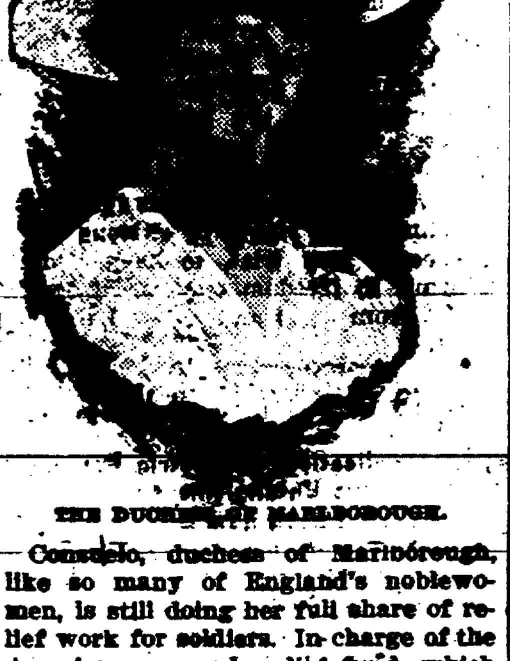
Woman's World

The Duchess of Marlborough and Her Devoted Work For War Relief.



THE DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH.

Consuelo, duchess of Marlborough, like so many of England's noblewomen, is still doing her full share of relief work for soldiers. In charge of the American women's relief fund, which has its hospital at Brighton, England, in co-operation with Lady Randolph Churchill, Lady Paget and Mrs. Lewis Harcourt, and assisted by her mother, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, she has untiringly helped bear her share of the burden put upon patriotic women all over the world today.

FIG FANCIES.

Beat to a cream one cupful butter and two cupfuls white sugar. Add two eggs well beaten and one teaspoonful of baking powder sifted with enough flour to permit easy olling. Roll thin and stamp out in any desired shape. Wet the edges, place a teaspoonful of fig filling on one side of the shape, turn out the other half, press the edges together and bake about ten minutes in a hot oven. To make the filling add to two cupfuls of figs, chopped fine, one cupful white sugar and one-half cupful water. Boil thirty minutes, cool and use.

A FAMOUS MISER.

Cooke Died Wealthy After a Life of Petty Saving and Trickery.

Thomas Cooke, known as the "Islington miser," left at his death more than $300,000. His whole life was one of penury, petty saving and petty trickery. He made it a habit in order to get meals for nothing to fall in a pretended fit in front of a house at dinner time and on recovering he would naturally be invited to share the meal, which he always did after the proper amount of protestation. Often he would pretend to these kind people that they had saved his life, would make a great fuss over them and tell them he intended to remember them or their children in his will.

One man, a poor relation, occasionally sent him small presents of butter. This angered Cooke, who said to him: "Why send me such driblets, you who are to get thousands and thousands at my death? Send me a firkin." The firkin and several more were sent, but neither this legacy nor any of the others came to reality.

Like many men shrewd in petty ways, he was easily deceived in matters out of his own line. Thus once when his horse was sick he was too mean to pay a horse doctor and asked advice of a quack, who told him he must take thirty onions, drill a hole through each, put them on a string, put the necklace around the horse's neck and let it stay there. The expense of thirty onions was too much; he bought fifteen, and when, after many days, they had served their purpose, he took them to the servant and ordered her to make an onion porridge for the day's dinner.—Exchange.

Homemade Toothpowder.

An effective tooth powder which can be always recommended is made as follows: One ounce of precipitated chalk, half an ounce of carbonate of soda, half an ounce of powdered orris root. Mix well together and pass three times through a sieve. Place in a bottle or in tins until required for use. The carbonate of soda removes the grease from the teeth and prevents decay, and the powdered orris root keeps the gums healthy.

The Vinegar Bible.

A copy of the "Vinegar Bible" may be seen at Newchurch church, Isle of Wight. It is a name given to an edition of the Bible published in 1717 at the Clarendon Press, Oxford. A misprint in the title of the twentieth chapter of St. Luke was made to read "Parable of the Vinegar" instead of "Parable of the Vineyard."

HOW TO KEEP YOUR PIANO.

Some years ago a piano expert said that it is a mistake to keep a piano tightly closed. The fall board should be left partly closed when one goes away for the summer. This keeps out the greater part of the dust and, what is more important, permits a circulation of air and helps to keep the strings in better condition. He says that the best way to prevent moths from getting into a piano is to have the piano blown out by a professional piano tuner occasionally in order to keep the dust out. Moths will attack new pianos as well as old ones. It is not always possible to guard against them, but the dust can be kept out by a blower.

Every piano dealer nowadays has piano blowers to sell, and these little bellows arrangements are not expensive. One can be bought for $3. Ordinarily the tuner will blow out the dust for 50 cents. On a grand piano the owner can use the bellows herself, but it is wiser to have a professional use it on an upright piano. If your piano is a player piano you can get a kinetic blower, which will cost you about $5 and which you can operate yourself.

SOUR CREAM.

How to Utilize This Valuable Food in Various Ways.

The idea with most women is not "What can we do with it, but instead tell us some new ways of using it profitably." Many of us have used sour cream for griddle cakes, biscuits of various kinds, cakes, cookies, shortcakes, puddings, salad dressings, meat sauces, fish sauces and, freezing it with fruit juices, have made most delightful ice cream. And did you ever use sour cream in place of milk in preparing a white sauce for codfish? If not, you have a treat in store. Do not cook the cream too long to allow it to curdle the mixture. But you ask for recipes, and here are just a few:

Sour Cream Cookies.—Take a cupful of sugar and a cupful of molasses to two cupfuls of rich sour cream, add two well beaten eggs, a teaspoonful of soda and one of baking powder, a tablespoonful of ginger, a dash of cinnamon and cloves and enough flour to roll. Let stand on ice to chill before rolling out.

Chocolate Cake.—Take a cupful of brown sugar and half a cupful of sour cream, half a teaspoonful of soda, one egg well beaten, a cupful and a half of flour sifted with a teaspoonful of baking powder. Dissolve two squares of chocolate in half a cupful of boiling water and add to the cake the last thing. Flavor with vanilla and bake in two layers.

Cabbage Salad.—Shred cabbage very fine and plunge into cold water to crisp. Drain and dress with sour cream, sugar, salt and, if not quite sour enough, a very little vinegar may be added. This is a salad which can be enjoyed at any meal with almost any combination of foods.

Sour cream when mixed with fruit juices and sweetened will freeze smooth and velvety. Orange juice with sour cream and sugar to sweeten is a combination especially tasty and delightful. Mix and freeze as an ice cream. Raspberry, grape juice or peach juice are others. Lemon is such an acid with the sour cream also an acid that the result is not so good unless a sour frozen dish is desired.

Hints For Traveling Baby.

The two most common mistakes made in traveling with children are with respect to their clothes and their food. In the hot summer weather, for a long journey, the little child should be dressed only in the sleeveless gauze shirt and diaper, with one thin outer garment. A sleeveless low necked slip of white china silk is best, since it is much cooler than cotton, sheds the dust and can be washed out in the basin when soiled.

It is well to change the baby's clothing as soon as the journey begins in order to have the regular outfit clean to put on when leaving the train. The little baby may go barefooted, but an older child should have barefoot sandals to protect the feet from the cinders scattered over the floor.

Mothers should observe the same regular hours for feeding their children as at home. One of the worst things she can do is to give the baby cakes, candy, bananas, sweet crackers and the like, as so many mothers do, to keep him quiet in the train. This kind of irregular feeding with unsuitable foods, together with the beat of the train and the fatigue and excitement of traveling, is very apt to upset the baby and make him irritable and restless.

Use a patent bottle to keep baby's milk cool, not warm. The porter will bring you a bowl of hot water to warm the feeding at the regular hour.

How to Renew Worn Tablecloth.

Buy four yards of torchon insertion at a sale; cut it in halves; then cut four squares from the best part of the tablecloth and join to insertion, using the selvages or outside edges for center of cloth, your insertion, of course, to cross the center. Trim edges and hem. Result, a very good looking tablecloth.

Another way is to cut carefully all around, hem it by hand and sew a wide torchon lace edge on the edge, making a round tablecloth to fit the table. The four corners cut from the above make four small hemstitched napkins.

FOR FALL WEAR.

Practical Suit to Replace Taffeta and Linen.

IDEAL FOR THE JUVENILE.

Serge, navy or brown will retain these plaits well. Patch pockets and a belt fitted in a novel way constitute a natty, if a simple, finish of the coat. The buttons are serge covered. A jaunty toque goes well with this trim suit.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR.

Recent Death of Longfellow's Daughter Recalls Old Poem.

Mrs. Richard Henry Dana, daughter of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, who died at her home in Manchester, Mass., recently, was the "Edith with golden hair" of Longfellow's "The Children's Hour." The poem, which was written about his three daughters when they were children, Miss Alice Longfellow, Mrs. Dana and Mrs. James G. Thorpe, is one of Longfellow's most appealing poems and shows clearly why children loved him so:

Between the dark and the daylight,
  When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
  That is known as children's hour.

I hear in the chamber above me
  The patter of little feet,
The sound of a door that is opened
  And voices soft and sweet.

From my study I see in the lamplight,
  Descending the broad hall stair,
Grave Alice and laughing Allegra
  And Edith with golden hair.

A whisper and then a silence,
  Yet I know by their merry eyes
They are plotting and planning together
  To take me by surprise.

A sudden rush from the stairway,
  A sudden raid from the hall!
By three doors left unguarded
  They enter my castle wall.

They climb up into my turret,
  O'er the arms and back of my chair;
If I try to escape they surround me;
  They seem to be everywhere.

They almost devour me with kisses,
  Their arms about me intwine,
Till I think of the bishop of Bingen
  In his mouse tower on the Rhine!

Do you think, oh, blue eyed banditti,
  Because you have scaled the wall,
Such an old mustache as I am
  Is not a match for you all?

I have you fast in my fortress
  And will not let you depart,
But put you down into the dungeon
  In the round tower of my heart.

And there I will keep you forever—
  Yes, forever and a day—
Till the walls shall crumble to ruin
  And molder in dust away.

KITCHEN KINKS.

Red ants will speedily leave if the infested places are soaked with pennyroyal oil, powdered cloves or borax, camphor gum or anything that has tar in it.

A white ring on a polished table may be removed by rubbing with a flannel cloth dipped in camphor.

If the bottoms of dishes that are set over the fire are first rubbed with soap they will afterward clean easily.

A white felt hat may be cleaned with warm cornmeal to which a little borax has been added.

When a suede belt or purse looks soiled and greasy rub with a fine emery paper, and it will look like new.

Germanic Allies Must Force a Battle Now

checked. On the Upper Dniester and in front of Lemberg they were held at the rate of a mile a day. Whey they entered Lemberg the hope of breaking the Russian forces asunder had disappeared.

Then came a change of plan, and the Teutons' next conception was to envelop some portion at least of those Russian armies which now formed the great salient of which Warsaw was the apex.

We know what followed. The attempt to cut off the salient completely broke down. The two Russian fronts, the one stretching from Ivangorod toward Kowel, the other stretching along the Narew and so up the Niemen, maintained so easy and perfect a resistance that the evacuation of the salient and of Warsaw itself was effected in the fullest manner undisturbed, without disorder, and that the Teuton plan was frustrated.

Once the Vistula was won, in spite of the very heavy losses in the East already incurred, the Teutons hight have come back West or might still have turned South to use their surplus power for an attempted breaking of the Franco-British containment, or for an attempted cut through to their Turkish ally.

They preferred to continue that adventure upon which they were already launched and we are now watching the continued effort to achieve a decision against an enemy still inferior in numbers of equipped men and munitionment, although that enemy has successively eluded battle for now four months, and although the season wherein a decision can be obtained is now within few weeks of its close.

Whether the Teutons have been wise or not in thus staking their very existence upon a real decision and a final victory in the East is not for contemporary chronicle to prophesy, or even to judge Only the future can determine. But we shall do well to appreciate most clearly in the days immediately before us that on their success or failure in Poland all their scheme will depend.

PALERMO MAN ACCUSED OF SELLING SHORT WEIGHT

William McCarthy, a farmer who lives in Palermo, was arrested at his home today by Officer Sweet, charged with selling butter in this city at short weight, on information made by City Sealer Harry M. O'Brien. McCarthy has a dairy farm and he comes to this city to sell his product to several customers. He has been warned several times to stop selling butter at short weight, after the Sealer had examined his parcels.

McCarthy asked for an adjournment this morning when arraigned before City Judge Wilson and he will be tried tomorrow afternoon. The offense is punishable by a fine. George M. Fanning appeared to press the charge.

John Luddy, who imbibed too freely yesterday, was arraigned this morning. Upon his promise to do better Judge Wilson suspended sentence.

"PACKY'S LAST FIGHT," SAYS MRS. McFARLAND

New York, Sept. 9.—"Packey" McFarland will fight his last fight Saturday evening at Brighton Beach.

This item of sporting news is absolutely authentic. Mrs. McFarland, Packey's real manager, sent out the ultimatum yesterday.

When I asked Mr. McFarland if I might meet his wife yesterday afternoon, he was just leaving for his training quarters at Brighton Beach, he pondered the question a very long time. Then he made his confession.

"Honest, I'm scared to ask her," he admitted. "You see, Mrs. McFarland doesn't approve of this fight at all. We never discuss it. And I hate to take any chances right now."

Rejuvenating the Fairs.

County fairs and country fairs are undergoing great changes. They are returning to their own again. Their popularity is being restored. This restoration is due to the fact that a new form of motor vehicle known as the automobile has come into extensive use during the past few years. It is due also to the fact that certain features like cattle sales, stock judging contests, farm bureau exhibits, and the things that interest the farmers are coming back to be important parts of the show.

It was a hard trip to the county fair a few years ago. If a farmer residing from 15 to 25 miles away wanted to make the journey in 1900, it was necessary for him to get started by 7 in the morning to reach the fair grounds at any seasonable hour. He left at 3 p. m. or thereabouts in order to get home for milking, and altogether it was a trying experience. Now he starts in his car at 9 or 10 in the morning, covers the distance in an hour, spends a leisurely day in town and makes a quick return home late in the afternoon. The automobiles and improved roads have also opened up a far wider territory from which the fairs draw and if the agricultural associations give shows that are worth while their patronage will increase.

The change in the form of exhibits is, after all, more of an addition than a change. Some of the old forms of exhibits die hard. They all but killed the fairs with their sameness. Who will travel far to a fair to see the same trunkful of fancywork displayed in floral hall that he has seen for the past 20 years and that has been carted over northern New York's fair circuit annually by the prize-seekers ever since the present generation of men were boys? There's nothing very exciting about such exhibits, and, although they survive, their days are numbered. More vital things are crowding them out. A fair, like every other enterprise—and it is an enterprise—must keep edging along to open new fields of interest, else it will stagnate and people will not patronize it.

The fair is being rejuvenated, and along new lines. The managers are seeing that they must give the people exhibits in the forms of things in which they are interested. This is the only way to insure the perpetuity of a county or country fair.—Watertown Times.

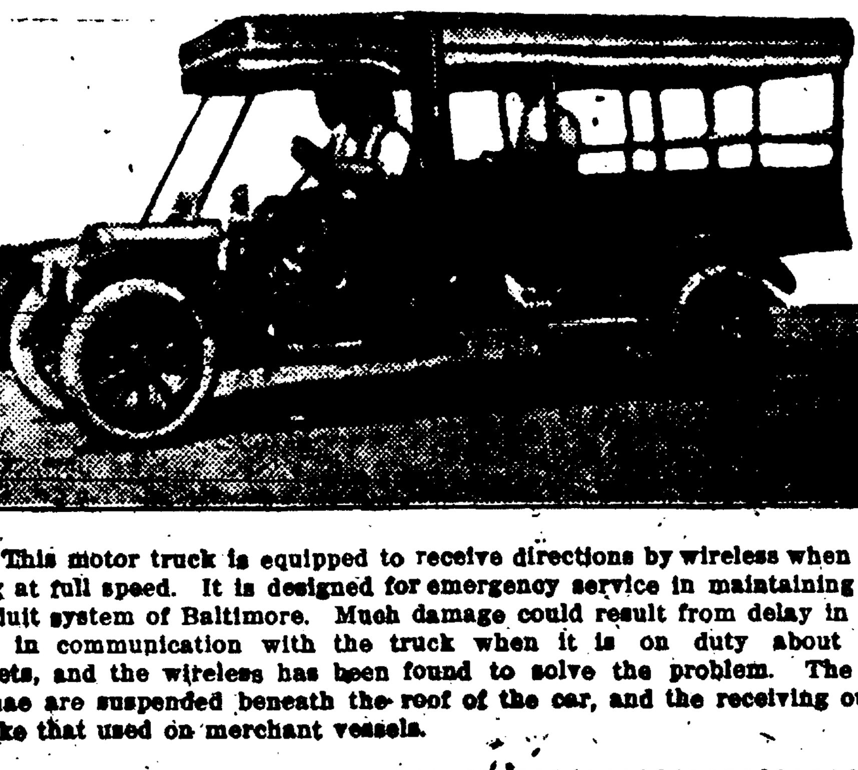
THIS TRUCK IS WIRELESS STATION



This motor truck is equipped to receive directions by wireless when running at full speed. It is designed for emergency service in maintaining the conduit system of Baltimore. Much damage could result from delay in getting in communication with the truck when it is on duty about the streets, and the wireless has been found to solve the problem. The antennae are suspended beneath the roof of the car, and the receiving outfit is like that used on merchant vessels.

COMMISSION WOULD LIMIT INHERITANCES TO $1,000,000

Some Members of Board Find Vast Fortunes Contribute to Unrest.

Vast fortunes and lack of work are the chief causes of the prevalent industrial and social unrest in this country, according to the summaries of three reports given out by the United States commission on industrial relations, which were prepared for the use of congress.

The commission then went out of existence. During the two years of work none of the members was able to reach an agreement over the vital problems, so that none of the three reports can be properly called a "majority" report. The board was composed of three members representing employees, three representing employers and three representing the general public.

Only the first section of the principal report, that made by Basil L. Manly, director of research and investigation for the commission, has been made public.

The Manly report finds that the social unrest in this country is largely due to the unequal distribution of wealth. It recommends the enactment of an inheritance tax so graded that, while making generous provision for the support of dependents and the education of minor children, it shall leave no large accumulation of wealth to pass into the hands which had no share in its production.

In the belief that social and industrial unrest can be in a large measure relieved by placing a million dollar limit upon inheritances members of the commission favor the establishment of a permanent industrial commission which should be supported by the income derived from an inheritance tax on large incomes.

It is proposed to graduate this tax from 1 per cent on the excess of a $25,000 fortune to 15 per cent on a fortune of more than $1,000,000. Other provisions of the report:

Warn against "industrial princes" like the Rockefellers, Morgans, Fricks, Vanderbilts and Astors.

Urge the absolute right of labor to organize and the enactment of national eight hour and minimum wage laws.

Advocate a revision of land laws and recommend litigation to regain public lands, water power and mineral rights obtained by fraud.

Urge taxation of nonproductive land, but exemption of the improvements thereon.

Urge an amendment to the constitution providing in specific terms against encroachment on rights of citizens to free speech, jury trial, to keep and bear arms, to freedom from excessive bail and from cruel and unusual punishment.

WIRES CUT BY NEW WAY.

German Application of Electric Forces Destroys Entanglements.

The Germans have now some mysterious scientific device for clearing a way through wire entanglements from a considerable distance, says a Petrograd dispatch. The instrument has all the appearance of what is known as a projector—that is, a searchlight. No specimen has yet been captured and nothing is known about it, except that it disposes of wire entanglements from a distance of a mile by some means at present incomprehensible to the lay mind.

Greek fire projectors have now made their appearance on the western front. These also were apparently intended originally to fuse wire defenses, but they can only operate from a maximum of a couple of score yards. The new instrument must probably be some novel and hitherto unknown application of electric forces.

Art.

Nobody has yet been able to define art correctly, because every conception of art differs with the individual. Nobody really knows what truth is, yet art is said to be truth plus personality. Personality itself is our most incomprehensible enigma.

Art must possess a supreme and constantly increasing interest. The best and most unfailing test of art is when it endures. Time, therefore, is necessary to proclaim it. All masterpieces turned out overnight are not to be trusted.

The true artist is, therefore, most likely to be unknown. Time crowns him master with one hand and destroys him with the other.—Life.

PROBLEM FOR DRIVER

FAULTY LUBRICATION CAUSES MANY DISAPPOINTMENTS.

And Proper Oiling Is Just as Important to the Owner of a Pleasure Car.

Performance and endurance of a racing car depend upon the lubrication of its driving parts. The lubrication of the motor especially is a most important point for the driver or his mechanician to watch. Statistics show that lubrication troubles have been responsible for the withdrawal of a great number of cars that had to quit the track when their drivers were traveling along with the speed and consistency that put the big prize almost within their grasp, when suddenly they were reduced to "also rans" because the lubrication went bad.

With modern, small, high efficiency motors, turning over from 2,500 to 3,000 and more revlutions per minute, a speed which would have been impossible years ago, it will be clear that the lubrication, especially of the bearings and metal contained therein, must be absolutely perfect to allow such tremendous speed to be maintained for a great period of time.

The racing car has developed the automobile, and the racing car is responsible for the development of metals, while the importance of lubrication systems has been instrumental in producing the reliable automobile of the present day. If lubrication is so important to the driver of a racing car it is much more worthy of all possible attention in a pleasure car.

SYSTEM OF WARNING SIGNS

Associations Are Placing Monitory Signals in Many Cities for Use of Passing Motorists.

In many cities associations are providing a system of warning signs upon the highways and boulevards, designed to advise automobilists of the proximity of schools, hospitals, fire stations and other institutions, where careful driving is necessary. These signs are always placed on the right side of the roadway upon which the cars approach, and about a block distant from the various buildings. If, for example, a hospital is located upon a corner, the "Hospital—Quiet" signs are placed about a block distant on each of the four streets leading to that institution. The sign proper may be square, round or oval, but usually they are conspicuous by reason of their white ground and clear lettering. Sometimes the posts are of wood, painted white, and in other localities the posts are of iron piping, covered with asphaltum or other rust-resisting paint. It is safe to say that the warning given is rarely disregarded.—Popular Mechanics.

Grinding Copper.

For the motorist who carries out most of his own repairs and replacements, a helpful reminder is that copper attempted to be ground in a carborundum wheel invariably clogs. By rubbing a little tallow on the copper this is obviated without in any way interfering with the cutting of the wheel.

Draining the Radiator.

An ordinary match is just the right size and length to push up the settlings that clog up the drain cock of the radiator, but be careful that it doesn't break off.

WEATHER FORECAST.

Fair tonight and Friday; somewhat lower temperature.

TO STEER MACHINE WITH FEET

This Device Will Enable Hard-Pressed Motor Cycle Rider to Have Hands Free for Other Uses.

Motor cyclists know how difficult it is sometimes to carry bundles, dodge street cars, open up the oil flow, and put on a coat or light a cigar all at the same time, says Farming Business. Here is a device, recently patented by a South Dakota man, to enable the hard-pressed rider to steer the machine with his feet. Pedals are pivotally mounted on the footboards of the machine. Springs are attached to pedals and footboards, a guide member being attached to the forward bar of the frame of the machine and having outwardly inclined arms. There are pulleys on the ends of these arms, guards for the pulleys, and a bar is secured to the fork of the machine above the mud guard, ropes being secured to the ends of this bar and to the forward ends of the pedals.

Twisted and Broken Axles.

The hub nuts that hold the rear wheels snugly to the tapered rear axles are always tight when the car is sent out from the factory, but after a variable amount of wear the wheel will get a little loose, and if not soon tightened up the pounding on the key and key-seat will tend to twist the axle or even break it. Keep the hub nuts tight.

Cylinder Gases.

If all the gases produced by the combustion of gasoline in the cylinders of a motor could be condensed, among them would be almost a gallon of water for every gallon of gasoline. To be exact, the burning of a gallon of gasoline produces .99 gallon of water in the form of steam.

Zeppelin Raid on London Strengthens British Recruiting

All Records Broken, Says Army Officer---Newspapers Advise Taking Air Raids More Seriously in Future---Trade Unionists Pledge Undivided Support.

London, Sept. 10.—"We have broken all records for recruiting in Trafalgar Square."

This was the announcement of Colonel Wood, chief of the Territorials' Association, yesterday. It was London's answer to the latest Zeppelin raids.

Referring to these raids in a strong, courageous speech at Croydon yesterday, Lord Robert Cecil said the assertion that England stood trembling at a few Zeppelins was the merest folly. The sentiment of England toward the Zeppelin assassin was not of fear, but disgust.

In this connection it may be permitter to say that the German official report about the raid on what Berlin fancifully terms the "west end of London" is a tissue of falsehoods. The English official report admitted that incendiary bombs caused fires, but these were immediately under control of the fire brigade.

Berlin says the effect of the raid was "perfectly satisfactory." Commenting on this, I cannot do better than quote Lord Robert Cecil's words, in which, expressing supreme confidence in the Allies' final victory, he declared that no rational being could imagine it would serve any military purpose to drop bombs on helpless women and children.

However, in one respect, Lord Roberts is wrong. The raids have served a military purpose because, though futile, they have caused another greatr ush of British manhood to the colors and have induced the great Trade Union Congress, in response to the ap[illegible]l of Mr. Lloyd George, to agree to suspend their by-laws and [illegible]k shoulder to shoulder with non-unionists in providing arms and [illegible]nitions that will, as the Minister said, insure a glorious victory.

Voicing the consensus of British press opinion, the Daily Tele[illegible] says: "Zeppelin raids are so many bloody sacrifices to Mo[illegible] The more civilian bloodshed the greater Germany's delight. [illegible] wild beasts, as Kipling calls them, have been encouraged to look [illegible]ward to London in flames, and its panic stricken population cow[illegible]g beneath a rain of shells, vainly begging for mercy. This is a [illegible]otted idea. The only effect produced by the latest raid is to dem[illegible]trate the perfect efficiency of the fire department and renew the [illegible]ermination of Londoners to crush the brutalized spirit which in[illegible]es these senseless outrages.

"Indeed, in many places in the London district the spectacle [illegible] Zeppelin high up in the heavens, with searchlights flashing upon it and shells bursting all around, was regarded, and even enjoyed, as a unique and thrilling experience."

The Evening Standard comments on the coolness shown everywhere, buf warns the public against the "noticeable widespread and dangerous disposition to regard the affair as a species of spectacle."

It suggests that in addition to the Zeppelin, which, within limits, "is a terrible instrument of war," there is also danger from anti-aircraft guns. Therefore the public, it says, "would be well advised to take aerial visitors more seriously than it did last night."

The Trades Union Congress adopted virtually without opposition at today's session a resolution presented by the Railway Clerks' Union on the subject of recruiting. The congress resolved:

"That the congress, being convinced that the issues involved in the present European war are of transcendent importance to the democracies of this and other countries, hereby records its entire approval of the action of the parliamentary labor party in co-operating with the other political parties in the national recruiting campaign."

The consensus, as revealed in speeches in support of the resolution, was that it was no part of the teaching of the trades unionism that it is the duty of man to turn the other cheek to the man who smies him. One speaker said that if when "dear brother Fritz" invaded Belgium the British government had not decided to resist this move the men and women of Britain would have forced it to do so.

ITALIANS TAKE THREE LINES OF TRENCHES IN CROCE

Paris, Sept. 10.The most important aggressive movement by the Italians is in the Cadore zone, to the east of the Trentino, and in Carnia, is now officially mentioned in the Italian war bulletin.

After an energetic infantry assault, on ground upon which the approach work had been performed by Italian artillery during the preceding week, three lines of enemy trenches were captured. The advance was then halted for the reconstruction of the trenches and other work incidental to the bringing up of the artillery for another period of preliminary work on the next line of defences.

The positions reached are in front of very strong works in the Monte Croce range, where the Austrians have added artificial barriers to the natural defences of precipitous cliffs, on which snow has fallen at intervals during the last ten days.

The Austrian defense works had long ago been placed in such

R. BENTON HOWARD, KILLED ENROUTE TO BROTHER'S FUNERAL

On his way with his wife, his brother and sister-in-law, to attend the funeral of a relative in Ithaca, R. Benton Howard was killed almost instantly yesterday morning when his large Overland touring car skidded from the road near Plainville, crashed through a rail fence and threw Mr. Howard out. Mrs. Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Burr Howard, who were also in the car, were uninjured and do not know today how the dead man received his injuries.

William B. Howard, a twin brother of Burr Howard, died on Monday in Ithaca and the party started for that place to attend the funeral yesterday morning. The car was traveling along at a good speed about a half-mile from Plainville when Mr. Howard attempted to make a sweeping turn. Something must have gone wrong with the steering gear, for the car skidded and lurched off the road, finally crashing through the fence.

Mrs. Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Burr Howard stayed in their seats and attempted to shield themselves from falling glass from the windshield. When the car came to a standstill they saw Mr. Howard lying on the ground near the fence. He was unconscious and in great pain. A passerby immediately started for a doctor while the Howard party remained with the injured man. Mr. Howard died soon after the doctor arrived. It is believed that a fence rail struck him when the car crashed into the fence and injured him internally.

Mr. Howard lived with his father, W. B. Howard, and the news of his son's death was a terrible shock to this aged man. The dead man was 47 years old and, beside his wife, is survived by four children. He has been [illegible]ed in farming for many years and has many friends in this [illegible] The funeral will be held Sunday and relatives from Ithaca ar[illegible]ed to arrive today.

a condition thati t would [illegible]less to attempt to take them by surprise. It is necessary to [illegible] methodically against each of them, a process which, as the o[illegible]etins reiterate, is necessarily slow, not merely because of the [illegible]pared resistance of the enemy, but because of the difficulty of [illegible] medium and heavy artillery in the mountains.

The Austrians, as the Italian authorities have remarked, while they had connected up their present centers of defense by means of modern lines of communication between one another and with their lines to the rear, had left that part of their territory immediately contiguous to the Italian frontier entirely without communication routes, in order that these might not be of service to the Italians, in case the latter were able to take the initiative and start a successful offensive on the entire line.

SPECIAL ELECTION BALLOTS ARRIVED TODAY

The ballots for the special election on Commission Government which will be held September 17, arrived today. The ballot contains two squares for the cross which marks the voter's preference and the question proposed.

Those who follow the elections very closely are predicting a merry time if the commission form wins at the polls, inasmuch as no more party nominations can be filed. In the event the commission form carries, it is said, all nominations will have to be independent nominations, and the parties will not be able to endorse a candidate. One man said this morning he was of the opinion that the present administration would have to remain in effect another year if the commission form carries because of the fact that no more nominations can be made and the names cannot be inserted on the primary ticket which contains the nominations for Mayor, Aldermen, etc., as well as the county offices.

RUSSIANS WIN, TAKING 7,000 PRISONERS

Petrograd, Sept. 10.—An official communication made public here announces another big success for the Russians in Eastern Galicia. Following their reported victory at Tarnopol, it is stated that southwest of Trembowla, during September 7 and 8, the Russians took as prisoners 150 officers and 7,000 men, and that the Teutons retreated hastily toward the River Strypa. The communication adds that the Russian captures since September 3 on the Sereth front total 383 officers and over 17,000 men and a great quantity of guns.

THE CALIFORNIA'S KEEL TO BE LAID

Washington, D. C., Sept. 10.—It was announced at the Navy Department today that the keel of the new dreadnaught California will be laid at the New York Navy Yard on October 14. There will be the usual ceremonies at the yard upon the occasion. The California, which will be constructed along the lines of the new dreadnaughts Mississippi and Idaho, will be the first electrically propelled war ship of her class in the world. In a sense her propulsion machinery will be in the nature of a great experiment.

She will cost in all between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000. Her hull and machinery will cost in the neighborhood of $7,000,000 and she will require between two and three years to build.

Her armament will include twelve fourteen-inch guns, mounted in four triple turrets. She will displace 32,000 tons. She will have special protection against submarines. This feature of her construction was decided upon before the recent experiments at Norfolk with regard to protection against torpedo attack.

FULTON WHOLESALER FIRST TO FILE PAPER

Walter J. Boomer, liquor dealer at Oneida and 2nd sts., has filed his application for renewal of his liquor license with H. W. Kandt, County Treasurer. Mr. Boomer defeated all other intending applicants, his papers and fee reaching Oswego yesterday, several hours ahead of the next man.

All liquor licenses expire at midnight, September 30.

The Free Methodist Conference Reports Indicate Prosperity

District Elders Elected Yesterday---Two Sermons Preached by Visiting Clergymen Whose Themes Had Direct Bearing Upon the Relation of Free Methodism to World

The business sessions of the Susquehanna conference of the Free Methodist church opened yesterday morning with singing, after which Rev. James Bradbrook read a Scripture lesson and offered prayer. Bishop B. R. Jones gave a fifteen-minute address which was very interesting and helpful. Then the roll call was called and the audience listened to the reports of the District elders; Rev. W. H. Clark reported for the Syracuse and Wayne districts; Rev. H. W. Fish for the Corning and Binghamton districts; Rev. G. L. Skinner for the Utica, Saratoga and Watertown districts, and Rev. J. C. Hessler for the New England districts.

Several of the pastors reported from their charges and ballots were cast for the election of District Elders for the coming year, and Rev. W. H. Clark, Rev. H. W. Fish and Rev. G. L. Skinner were declared elected.

The business session closed at 11:30 a. m. and re-opened this morning at 830. The afternoon service began at 2:30 and a very attentive audience listened to an inspiring sermon preached in spirit and power by Rev. B. Russel.

He took for his text: "And Saul also went home to Gibeah, and there went with a band of men, whose hearts God had touched." I Sam. 10:26.

Among other things he said "There is a sense in which man may touch the heart of man but God can touch it as man cannot. The touch of God is transforming. He takes the stoneness out of the heart and that heart begins to feel. Suppose in the place of fading flowers and dying shrubs we could have unfading flowers and never-dying shrubs. The person who could do this would be noted everywhere. But Christ can do this for our hearts. He will take out everything dead and give us life and our hearts will be like a 'well watered garden.' We may all have this life-giving touch. It makes us what we ought to be, no matter how crooked or how far we have deviated in the past.

"We have this touch not only on Sunday and shouting day, but every day. I am glad it is not a vanishing touch. I am glad Christ begins at the bottom and goes clear to the top. He begins at the heart and goes clear to the finger tips. This is a healing touch. We meet Jesus one day and health begins to surge through our bodies and never stops until we are made whole. The touch brings us together. This is the thing that has made the Free Methodist church, although small, as solid as it is. Every once in a while they are ready for our funeral and are about to lower our casket into the grave, but we refuse to beb uried, and if they stop to simmer down and find the facts they find someone else is dead.

"A man that has the touch of God can face anything the world has to offer. If you haven't had it go in for it. There is nothing like the touch of God to help you through."

In the evening Rev. F. Baker preached a sermon freighted with old-time power from Matt. 3:3, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight."

He said in part:

"Our needs are great individually and collectively. And sooner or later we realize it is 'not by might nor by power.' But God doesn't come unless he is invited and desired. We should desire God as David did when he said, 'My heart panteth after thee.' A saint pants after God more than after food, sleep or anything. We are to make this preparation by prayer. We need prayers these days. We have singers, but we need more prayerers. God wants to come."

This service closed with several souls seeking God at the altar.

Evangelist Patrick Morgan will give an address at the State Street M. E. church this evening at 7:30.

Street meetings will be held also this evening at 6:45, one on the West Side of the river, near the Congregational church, one on the East Side, near the corner of Oneida and First sts.

BATTLE ISLAND POWER CO. SERVES PAPERS ON THE COUNTY CAPITAL

The Battle Island Power company of this city, through its attorneys, Collins, Wells & Highues, of 120 Broadway, New York, has served a summons and complaint on the city of Oswego enjoining the city from developing more than one-half of the water power at the big dam there.

Edward Quirk, President of the Battle Island Co., claims ownership to lands on the east side of the dam and further claims right to one-half the surplus flow of water. This suit, attorneys claim, will take years to clear up. Dr. Carrington McFarlane of Oswego sold the lands now owned by the Battle Island Co. to Edward Quirk of this city. Mr. Quirk sold the property to Thomas Hunter and he conveyed the land to the power company.

When the City of Oswego purchased the land at the dam it was urged to buy the narrow strip in question, but at that time attorneys claimed thel and carried with it no riparian rights.

The Hesperian Was Armed.

Consul Frost cabled from Queenstown to our State Department yesterday the joint affidavit of Captain Main and the first and second officers of the Hesperian, declaring that from fragments of steel which fell on the deck, and the odor of a high explosive, it was indibutably shown that the ship was struck by a torpedo.

The affidavit also set at rest the question as to whether or not the Hesperian was armed. In an earlier despatch Consul Cook had asserted that the liner carried a 4.7 inch gun astern. The affidavit admits that a gun was carried, and that it was even of larger caliber than at first reported, the bore being six inches in diameter. It explains that the gun was painted a "service grey" and would not have been conspicuous even at short range, and probably would not have been observed at all through the periscope of a submarine. The explanation, however, leaves much to conjecture. The gun was unquestionably on board for the purpose of defense against hostile submarines, and had the crew been able to detect one of these boats it would doubtless have fired at it. The painting of the gun with a color difficult to detect from a periscope was evidently for the purpose of having a submarine get near enough to be fired at effectively. Despatches have stated that the Hesperian was chased for some time before she was attacked. The undersea boat must therefore have sighted the liner when it was daylight, and a strong glass might detect a gun aboard. The possibility that the gun was seen may not only explain that the Hesperian was attacked because she was armed, but also that the attack was made just as darkness was falling becuse the gun could not then be effectively used against the submarine.—Utica Observer.

The Grand Duke Goes Into Exile.

Berlin may not celebrate the transfer of the Grand Duke to the Caucasus. There may be no flags or cannon fire, but it is hard to believe that there will not be sincere rejoicings. Germany has so far failed to capture the Russian armies, but she has disposed of their commander.

The little that has come to us from the eastern front has confirmed the earlier feeling that the Grand Duke was a great soldier, the greatest of Russian generals. Even in defeat he has displayed rare skill and—to the eyes of all military observers—something approximating real genius.

But he has been defeated. His iron discipline has antagonized the political soldiers and the politicians who are not soldiers. Disaster which dies not seem to be chargeable to him had procured his downfall. He goes into something approaching exile, and the consternation in Paris and London is already patent.

Who is to succeed him in the field? Certainly not the Czar. Conceivably it may be Russky, the general of the early victories in Galicia, now commanding on the Dvina and defending Riga. Possibly it will be a man as little known to the world as was Linevitch when he replaced Kuropatkin in Manchuria. The parallel between the fate of the Grand Duke and that of Kuropatkin will be in many minds.

Frederick the Great once said of one of his commanders that while he was a good soldier he was unlucky, and his ill luck made him too expensive a servant. Unhappily no one will feel now that Russia has a man to replace the Grand Duke, and the dismissal will seem a greater disaster than were those that have preceded.

A new anxiety has plainly arisen for the allied nations. They will have reason to fear alike for the Czar's choice of a successor and for his own tenacity of purpose in the face of other disasters.

Germany will unquestionably recall with joy the fact that the change of Czars saved Frederick the Great and the change of mind of Alexander ruined Napoleon. Is Russia for a third time to serve German ends? This, even more than the fate of Constantinople, will hold the attention of the whole world.—New York Tribune.

In Pennsylvania the State Federation of Liquor Dealers in session at Reading aligned itself with the anti-suffragists and resolved to give them financial support.

GO TO THE FRONT

Rabid Rudolph's logic once lay along this line: If the enemy attacked us from the rear I'd be the first to go to the front. And Rabid Rudolph's pholosophy may be applied to divers places and matters.

For instance the enemy "has attacked from the rear" in the case of our city government. The enemy,—inefficiency, irresponsibility and ignorance has planted its destructive guns firmly upon the bulwarks of the welfare of the city. The business management, that should—be protecting fort has failed in its purpose because of the system.

The men at the helm of affairs have been unable to perform their duties in a manner satisfactory to the people. To manage a city is no child's play. To manage any business one is not familiar with, and manage it efficiently, would require a superman. To attempt to manage a city and divide the task with that of a progressive, and fail in the attempt through ignorance is no disgrace. The disgrace lies in the unacknowledged fact that "it can't be done." Should the butcher or broker by a wave of the hand be transplanted to a real estate, newspaper, or law office to manage that business in conjunction with that of his own we could all see what to predict.

Then why not have our city managed on a business basis, one man as manager giving his entire time? If he fails to "manage" we could dismiss him. He would want to make good to keep his job.

Go "to the front" by voting yes on Commission Form of Government of September 17. You will get one hundred cents worth for every dollar you pay in taxes if it carries.

Humboldt tells of the Indian ladies of the Orinoco who would leave their huts without a fragment of clothing on, but these same creatures, "dear creatures," would not dare to commit such a breach of decorum as to go out unpainted. Then paint is necessary, clothing unnecessary. Some say that we have advanced.—The Silent Partner.

GET ON OR OFF

Work is never work when you are really in earnest, when you truly, honestly, sincerely are in sympathy with what you are trying to do.

Play proves nothing but a bore, tedious and tiresome, when your heart is not in the game.

It's not how much you work, but how much you want to work. You never will do well until you want to do well.

Your success depends on your mental attitude toward the task on hand, the business before you.

It is not the number of hours that you devote to your work, it's the number of earnest hours, and the amount of enthusiasm, that you put into your work.

Get into the game mentally. The field is filled with muffers, bluffers and grand-stand players. If you cannot warm up, get off the track, and give the trail to some one who can show speed without a windshield.

Nobody cares much what happens to the indifferent man, so long as he does not hang around and get in the way of those who would work.

Your life is your own, and you can do with your life as you please; but you have no right, no legal or moral right, to put your feet in the trough and refuse to let any one else get there.

When you get discouraged, disheartened, and you feel that everything is going out and nothing coming in, just go down to the dock and watch the tide at its lowest level, and then watch it come back in again.

Your failure is of little importance to the world. The world is lumbered up with failures. If you refuse to work, you are in the way. Get on or get off.—The Silent Partner.

The Pass of Thermopylae

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

XERXES once led a million soldiers out of Persia in an effort to capture Greece, but his invasion failed utterly, because a Spartan captain had entrenched a hundred men in a narrow mountain pass, which controlled the road into Lacedaemon. The man who was first on the ground had the advantage.

Advertising is full of opportunities for men who are first on the ground.

There are hundreds of advertising passes waiting for some one to occupy them. The first man who realizes that his line will be helped by publicity, has a tremendous opportunity. He can gain an advantage over his competitors that they can never possess. Those who follow him must spend more money to equal his returns. They must not only invest as much, to get as much, but they must as well, spend an extra sum to counteract the influence that he has already established in the community.

Whatever men sell, whether it is actual merchandise or brain vibrations, can be more easily sold with the aid of advertising. Not one half of the businesses which should be exploited are appearing in the newspapers. Trade grows as reputation grows and advertising spreads reputation.

If you are engaged in a line which is waiting for an advertising pioneer, realize what a wonderful chance you have of being the first of your kind to appeal directly to the public. You stand a better chance of leadership than those who have handicapped their strength, by permitting you to get on the ground before they could outstrip you. You gain a prestige that those who follow you, must spend more money to counteract.

If your particular line is similar to some other trade or business which has already been introduced to the reading public, it's up to you to start in right now and join your competitors in contesting for the attention of the community. The longer you delay the more you decrease your chances of surviving. Every man who outstrips you is another opponent, who must be met and grappled with, for the right of way.

News Letter Suggestions for Holding County Fairs

"The Weekly News Letter" speaks of a topic interesting to this vicinity. It says:

The county agricultural fair is, at least nominally, held for the upbuilding of agriculture and to lead up to such ideals as will elevate, inspire, educate, and broaden the thought and activities of the rural people. There is a decided tendency among the promoters of many county fairs to make them what they should be—truly agricultural.

A good fair is one that entertains and educates. It must do both. It should be an agricultural exhibition essentially; also fundamentally useful to intelligent, practical farmers and their families. It may also be made entertaining in the highest sense. People will attend a fair if there is anything interesting and beneficial worth going to see. There are many ways to make it so, among them:

Appoint directors and superintendents because of their willingness to work, ability to accomplish results, and not to fill honorary positions.

Exclude all morally objectionable side shows, all gambling devices, all catch-penny swindlers and all venders of worse than useless trash.

Offer liberal, well-proportioned prizes for the best exhibits of farm, orchard, and garden products; also afford exhibitors every reasonable facility to make exhibits attractive.

Offer properly classified prizes for the best live stock and poultry shown, and arrange, as far as possible, adequate means for their care and protection and for inspection by visitors.

Offer substantial prizes for the best farm exhibit by farmers' clubs, organizations, or divisions in the county.

Offer liberal prizes for exhibits of
Offer liberal prizes for exhibits of dies, and furnish the best place for their display.

Provide a special department for the use of the agricultural college and experiment station that they may show graphically and otherwise the different soil types of the county with suggested fertilizers, crop rotations, grasses for hay and pasture, pruning and the spraying of orchards and gardens, specimens of weed seeds and insect pests, rations for different classes of live stock, models and cost of constructing silos, barns, farm and home conveniences, domestic science, and art.

Induce the county superintendent and State Department of Education to make an exhibit of model school houses, equipment, and grounds, and display of handwork done by pupils in the public schools of the county. Also take one day and call it "School Day." Oration and essay contests can be put on subjects to be farm and farm life topics. An athletic contest between the schools of the county be held.

Have a special exhibit of sanitary arrangements, appliances, reports, tables, and charts by the county and State Boards of Health.

Provide facilities for daily lectures, illustrated and otherwise, on farm and home life, sanitation, and public welfare. Demonstrations by individuals, boys and girls in club work, organizations, and so on.

Allot space for the exhibit of the county man and woman agents in farm and home demonstration, boys' and girls' club work.

Conduct plowing, team pulling, corn judging, stock judging, and other farm contests on the grounds for the men and boys.

Induce manufacturers of machinery, cement, dynamite, farm and home equipment, to exhibit their product and demonstrate the same.

Offer prizes for the largest delegation sent by the various farmers' organizations of the county.

Arrange a series of floats representing county historical events ond so on.

Have a parade of prize-winning live stock once daily.

Let there be racing, driving, and riding, but no betting. The horses should, as far as possible, be local and be driven or ridden to show the fastest or best in the county.

Have plenty of good music, such as bands and choruses.

Locate several rest rooms, with chairs, cots for sickness and children, water, toilet, etc., where they will be easy of access.

Advertise the fair and news concerning it widely and continually, by means of the public press of the county, catalogs, posters, stickers, etc.

Get the working co-operation of teachers, preachers, farmers, merchants, bankers, lawyers, doctors and other business men to boost, popularize and solicit the preparation of something for exhibit by their farmer friends.

Do everything possible to develop friendly community spirit and rivalry.

The county fair if rightly organized offers the mass of farmers in a district one of the best means of useful instruction, inspiration and entertainment. Any sudden or radical change of methods of conducting some fairs would probably bankrupt them. The most needed reforms should be gradual, dttermined, but constant, until the ideal educational fair is reached.

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS

In Denver late in August the Governor of Pennsylvania in a public address declared, not only that the women of his state should have the ballot, but that they were going to have it in November.

In San Francisco the Association of Collegiate Alumnae placed itself back of the equal suffrage by a vote of 236 out of 273. Only 13 voted against it; 24 refrained from voting. "This is what comes," so ran the banner carried in the suffrage parade "of teaching girls to read."

* * *

In West Virginia the State Educational Association in session at Charleston endorsed the pending woman suffrage amendment to the State Constitution.

In Pittsburgh Mayor Young of Phoenix, Arizona, in an interview in the Pittsburgh Sun of August 20, said that, if woman suffrage were to be re-submitted in his state where the women have voted since 1912, the would not be an intelligent vote c against it. He also credited the women with rendering mighty help in keeping the municipal expenses down and in furthering good roads, public drinking fountains, and all sorts of enterprises that make people comfortable.

In Chicago Judge Sculley has handed down an opinion which declares that women, even though they can vote in Illinois for President, yet they cannot vote for the delegates to the national convention which will nominate candidates for President.

Billy Sunday has announced himself on the side of woman suffrage and gives as his reason that he is in "favor of anything the devil is against."

SETTING OUT ROSE BUSHES

Points to Be Remembered by Those Who Are Fond of the Fragrant Flower.

All roses are heavy feeders and require rich, moist soil. A clay soil, if well enriched and having perfect drainage, is ideal. Pruning should be carefully done, preferably in the spring. All weak growth should be cut out and the balance well cut back. The flowers of almost all roses being borne on the new wood, the bushes should be cut back half or more of their growth.

In the majority of cases, roses on their owns roots will prove more satisfactory than budded stock. On own-rooted stock, the suckers or shoots from below the surface of the soil will be of the same kind, whereas with budded roses there is danger of the stock starting into growth and, not being discovered, and finally killing out the weaker growth. Still, if the plants are set deep enough to prevent adventitious buds of the stock from starting, there is no question that finer roses may be grown than from plants on their own roots.

In setting out the rooted bushes, do not crowd the roots into a small space, but have the roots well spread out and the ground well firmed around them.

GARDENS FOR THE WINTER

Specially Designed Boxes Will Always Be Found to Secure the Best Possible Results.

If it is possible, the boxes should be made to order. When one realizes that these boxes will last for many seasons, this does not seem extravagant. Good wood can then be selected, and the boxes made to fit the exact space one wishes to devote to them. Whatever the length desired, do not have the boxes less than one foot wide and one foot deep.

Excellent boxes may be purchased ready made at the various florist shops and department stores in the city if one does not care to go to the trouble of having them made. Never set the boxes flat on the porch or window sill, but support the ends by pieces of "two-by-four." In the bottom of each box bore quarter-inch holes at a distance of six to eight inches apart, to insure drainage.

Paint Up!

Says the Abilene Reporter: "A gallon of paint costs less than two dollars and will go a long way toward covering your house. It not only improves the beauty of the structure but preserves the wood from decay. It is cheaper to paint up than not to do so." This advice is particularly applicable to conditions now existing in our own city. There is a large amount of unemployed labor here that could be profitably used in such work and with a great number of vacant houses needing the application of the paint brush, the owners of such houses could find no more opportune time for enhancing the value of their own property and at the same time giving employment to a deserving class of citizens now forced into idleness.

Community Builders.

To be a community builder is a great thing, an invaluable thing, of the utmost importance. There are many men who can make money who are in no way community builders. They have nothing of the ability to help their neighbors along as they progress themselves, that is accumulate for their own pocket. The builder does more. He encourages, enthuses his neighbors, leads them into better methods of doing what they are pursuing, leads them into more profitable and hopeful employment of their faculties. The builder is worthy wherever he is found. He is especially a great factor in the farming community.—Greenville (Tex.) Banner.

The Small Town.

Now, living is the most important business that a man has to do. He picks out a place for it with the same care that he picks out a location for a factory, a store or an office, and whenever it is possible for him to pick out the place that he likes the best, he picks out a small town, unless he is one of those foolish persons who think that joy is to be found in a cabaret, pleasure in a crowd. If the normal man cannot take up his residence in a small community, that is his dream of the future.—Bloomington Journal.

Scene from "When Dreams Come True," at the Wieting Opera House, Syracuse, Next Week.

Home and School Gardens.

The federal bureau of education announces it will investigate and promote home and school gardens. Ethel Gowans, a graduate of the New York State College of Agriculture, is temporarily in charge.

Progressive Minneapolis.

Minneapolis is outclassing all other American cities in utilizing flowers to ornament the business streets. Window boxes and hanging gardens have been introduced in all the shopping thoroughfares.

Curious Letter Endings.

A few specimens of the style of beginning and ending letters in the old days may prove interesting as in striking contrast to the laconic "yours obediently," "faithfully" or "truly" of the present day. It would certainly be difficult to match the following subscription of a letter from the Duke of Shrewsbury to Sir Thomas Hanmer, dated September, 1713: "I desire that you will believe that, wherever I am, I shall always endeavor to deserve, and very much value your friendship, being, with a sincere esteem, sir, your most faithful and obedient servant, Shrewsbury."

Frequently one meets with bellicose subscriptions, as in the case of the Earls of Huntly and Errol, who in 1594 threatened "awful consequences" to the magistrates of Aberdeen unless they released certain gentlemen imprisoned in their city and subscribed, "Yours as ye will, either present peace or weir."

Quotes the Headlines.

"Do you see that youngster standing on the corner with his hands in his pockets and whistling with all his might?"

"Of course I see him and hear him too."

"He's one of the calamity howlers in our neighborhood."

"You must be mistaken."

"No, I'm not. He sells newspapers after school."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Telling Time in West Africa.

Because of the scarcity of clocks in West Africa events are timed by the regular daily occurrences. For example, a native wrote that she had received news of her sister's illness "a little while before the guinea fowl talk"—that is, about 5 o'clock in the morning.

Babies in Pillows.

Babies are carried on, or rather in, long pillows by the peasant women in Hungary. A babe is laid on the pillow, the end is lapped over and is usually long enough to come up to the infant's chin. A string is then tied around the pillow, holding it close about the youngster, thus making a snug and comfortable little bed.

The Scrap Book

He Delivered It.

A boy walked into the office of the telegraph company at Chicago and asked for a job. He said his name was Missouri. The manager happened to want a messenger boy just at that moment and gave him a message that had to be delivered in a hurry.

"Here's your chance, my boy," said the manager, "these people have been kicking about undelivered messages. Now, don't come back until you have delivered it."

A little while afterward the telephone rang. On the other end of the wire there appeared to be a building watchman, somewhat terrified.

"Have you got a boy they call Missouri?" inquired the watchman.

"We did have ten minutes ago," replied the manager.

The watchman continued:

"That Missouri feller came over here and said he had to go to one of the offices. We don't allow no one up at that office at this hour, and I told him he couldn't go."

"Yes, yes," said the manager.

"Well," said the watchman, "he said he would go, and I had to pull my gun on him."

"But you didn't shoot him?" exclaimed the manager.

"No," meekly came back the response over the wire, "but I want my gun back."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Hope.

There is no grave on earth's broad chart
But has some bird to cheer it.
So hope sings on in every breast,
Although we may not hear it.
And if today the heavy wing
Of sorrow is oppressing
Perchance tomorrow's sun may bring
The weary heart a blessing.

The Abducted Voter.

A Londoner of pronounced Tory principles had a wife with strong radical tendencies. On the morning of a contest in which every vote was of the utmost importance his better half insinuatingly suggested over breakfast that they should enjoy what promised to be a glorious day by driving in the country.

The husband readily consented, and after a pleasant outing they returned in the evening just as 8 o'clock was chiming. Then said the wife sweetly, "It is too late now, dear, to vote in this election."

"Yes," was the reply, "but I voted at 8 o'clock this morning, before you came downstairs."—London Tatler.

Time to Call a Halt.

One night an esteemed citizen was enjoying his after dinner smoke and evening paper when little Willie rambled into his zone wearing a perplexed expression.

"Papa," said he, "why is it that people of Africa are black?"

"Because, my boy," was the prompt rejoinder of the old man, "they are always in the sun."

"Um, I see," thoughtfully commented Willie, and then continued, "Papa, why do people hang clothes out on the line?"

"So that the sun will bleach them white, of course," answered father, once more returning to his paper.

"Then, papa," persisted Willie, his look of perplexity getting deeper, "why is it"—

"Cut out the talk!" broke in father. "Can't you see that I am busy?"—Philadelphia Telegraph.

A steamboat captain who has spent fifty years with the Hudson River Day line is responsible for the following:

"A lot of passengers who had arrived in Albany by train came aboard early one morning," he says. "The boat was crowded, and many of them stretched themselves out on deck to sleep until sailing time. We hadn't got far out of Albany when a much dismayed man came up to me.

"'I've lost my shoes,' says he.

"'How'd you do that?' says I.

"'I put 'em in a cupboard,' says he.

"'Cupboard?' says I.

"'Yes,' says he. 'When I come on the boat I went to lie down, so I naturally takes my shoes off. So I seen a cupboard, and I put 'em inside. Now the shoes ain't thar.'

"'Show me the cupboard,' says I.

"The man led me to the sta'board paddlewheel box, which had been left open as usual during the night to permit inspection.

"'I put the shoes right in thar on one of them shelves,' says my 'man from up state.

"You don't need to be told what happened, for the shelves were the paddle blades, and the very first revolution of the shaft had dumped the passenger's footgear into the Hudson."—New York Post.

Safety First.

Colonel E. Polk Johnson of Louisville, who fought for the Confederacy, read something in the dispatches from the front the other day that reminded him very much of what happened when he was serving in the western army.

"I remember it was a wet, cold, rainy night in the middle of winter," said the veteran, "when a long, lean chap in my regiment was ordered to go on picket duty. He thought the situation over for a minute, and then he turned to the sergeant who had brought the message. 'You go right straight back whar you come from,' he drawled, 'and tell the cap'n I just natchelly can't do it. I got a letter from Gin'ral Bragg this mawnin', and he said good men was gittin' mighty skeerce in this here army and for me to take good care of myse'f.'"—Argonaut.

Datey and day and datty,
Go-go and dah and dee,
And I know you can learn their meanings
In one little lesson from me.

Go-go, of course, means go-go;
Datty, of course, means me;
Day's definition is mother;
Datey is father or see.

Dah is all else in creation,
Save only the things that are dee.
Just look where he points to discover
What dee or what dah it may be.

Why trouble to learn Esperanto?
How much more involved it must be
Than datey and day and datty
And go-go and dah and dee?

Effect of the Sun on Monuments.

The perpendicularity of a monument is visibly affected by the rays of the sun. On every sunny day a tall monument has a regular swing leading away from the sun. This phenomenon is due to the greater expansion of the side on which the rays of the sun fall. A pendulum placed inside, say, Nelson's column, in Trafalgar square, would be found to describe on every clear day an ellipse of pretty nearly half an inch in diameter.—London Telegraph.

CENTRAL CITY'S GAIN 6.8 P. C.

June Census Shows Gain of Nearly 10,000 In Five Years; Few Aliens Numbered, Says Report.

Albany, Sept. 10.—Syracuse is a city of 146,583, having added 9,334 residents during the past five years. The gain in population amounts to 6.8 per cent. Within the past ten years Syracuse has had a growth of not less than 24.7 per cent. Official census figures, as shown by the June enumeration, were made public today by Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State. Including the 3,800 students, who attend Syracuse University nine months or more each year, Syracuse passes the 150,000 mark in population. The aliens residing in the Central City are comparatively few, amounting to 14,067.

Inmates at institutions within the borders of Syracuse, such as the orphanages, shelters, house of providence and institution for the feeble minded, number 1,748, of which 115 are aliens.

From 1892 to 1900 Syracuse had a gain of 16,430 residents, or 17.9 per cent. The census of 1892 credits Syracuse with 91,944 residents. In the last 23 years the sons and daughters of Onondaga have increased 54,639.

During the five years between the enumeration of 1900 and 1905 Syracuse added 9.129 residents, making a gain in population that amounted to 8.4 per cent. In 1905 Syracuse had a population of 117,503. By 1910 the city had grown to one of 137,249, a gain of 19,746 persons, or 16.8 per cent.

The population of Syracuse as given by the last five enumerations, with the gain in each instance, is shown to be as follows:

1892, 91,944.
1900, 108,374; gain 16,430.
1905, 117,503; gain 9,129.
1910, 137,249; gain 19,746.
1915, 146,583; gain, 9.334.

Gain in past ten years, 29,080 persons, or 24.7 per cent.

While the 3,800 students attending Syracuse University really live the greater part of the year in the city and in many ways are actually a part of its population, particularly as they are replaced year by year with an increasing number, the recent enumeration included only those who have a permanent residence in Syracuse. As in other cities, transients at the hotels, the Y. M. C. A. and other places were not counted as a part of the city enumerated, but were credited, if residents of this state, to the place where they rightfully reside.

CITY CHAMBERLAIN GOES BY AUTO TO NEW YORK

Mr. and Mrs. Lou Pollock and son, Melville, of New York City, who have been spending several weeks in this city, left for their home by automobile today, accompanied by George Washburn, City Chamberlain, who will spend his vacation of one week in the metropolis renewing old acquaintances. The party will tour to New York by way of Albany and expect to reach the big town tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Pollock is enthusiastic over Fulton's advantages as a residential and business city and is seriously considering making his home here. During his stay here he spent much of his time fishing and is able to take back bona fide proof of his practical piscatorial skill to his friends as Mr. Washburn and Mr. Pollock are in a position to corroborate any of the angler's statements. Mrs. Pollock also has severeal good catches to her credit, and during their stay here the New oYrkers have made many warm friends.

THE QUIRK TODAY

James Forbes' comedy in five happy reels of chuckles and smiles with Irene Fenwick in the lead, will be today's attraction at The Quirk. "The Commuters" is the title of the play; it is described as a quaint tale of the suburbanite and his night off—a cabaret show and a moment of weakness when the French orchestra leader is invited to a manor to spend the night. There is morning and a day of reckoning and a meeting of the local society of suffragettes.

Another reel is announced and Santos & Smith, the Ragtime Brass Band Banjoists, is the vaudeville act—one that is sure to please.

Tomorrow, "The Woman Who Dared," in five parts; another reel and again, Santos and Smith.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 10.—The proposed amendment to the State Constitution which defines clearly the line of succession to the office of governor in the event of the death, disability or removal of the chief executive, is another remedial proposition which will set at rest, for the next twenty years at any rate, any doubt as to the official who is to temporarily be given the reins of government.

There have been many ambiguities in the State Constitution and many sections to articles which have not been precise in their meaning. Many of these shortcomings will have been removed, it is claimed by the leaders of the Constitutional Convention if the people accept the amendments which required nearly five months to perfect. The amendment to Article 4, herewith set forth seeks to remove any doubt as to the line of succession to the chair of the chief executive. The amendment in question reads:

"If the office of governor be vacant the lieutenant-governor shall become governor for the residue of the term. If the governor be under impeachment or be unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office or be absent from the state the lieutenant-governor shall act as governor during such inability, absence or the pendency of such impeachment.

"If the office of governor be vacant and there be no lieutenant-governor, such vacancy shall be filled for the remainder of the term at the next general election happening not less than three months after such vacancy occurs; and in any such case, until the vacancy be filled by election, the temporary president of the senate, or if there be none, the speaker of the assembly shall become governor until the first day of the political year next succeeding the election at which the office of governor shall be filled. If the office of governor be vacant and the lieutenant-governor be under impeachment, or unable to discharge the powers and duties of the office of governor or be absent from the state, the temporary president of the senate shall act as governor during such inability, absence or the pendency of such impeachment. If the temporary president of the senate be unable to discharge the powers and duties of the office of governor or be absent from the state, the speaker of the assembly shall act as governor during such inability or absence."

No provision is made for a further continuance of the transcending inheritance to the office of governor, Very rarely has there been occasion to look for more than one successor to the chair of supreme state authority When William Sulzer was impeached and Martin L. Glynn, the lieutenant-governor succeeded him automatically, it happened that the acting governor left the state for several days, or at least was required to be absent from his executive duties. At that time Senator Robert F. Wagner, the temporary president of the senate acted as governor, yet no successor was elected to take his place in the senate, neither when he was acting lieutenant-governor, nor when he was acting governor.

Governors are rarely called out of the state, yet during the present year Governor Whitman and Speaker Sweet attended the Panama-Pacific Exposition. This left Lieutenant-Governor Schoenbeck to administer the affairs of state. Had anything happened to him, there would have been no acting governor until the return of Governor Whitman.

CONFESSES TO ROBBERY PLOT

Nephew of Mrs. Nichols Places Jewelry Loss Not to Exceed $10,000---Safe Found Intact.

New York, Sept. 10.—With the full confession made by one of her retinue of servants much of the mystery surrounding the robbery and murder of Mrs. Elizabeth Griggs Nichols, the wealthy widow of James E. Nichols, was dispelled within twelve hours of the commission of the extraordinary crime. The police last night sent out a general alarm for the arrest of Arthur Woltenen, formerly a servant in the Nichols household, and for an associate known as "Eddie." They are wanted for homicide.

According to the admissions made to the police by Onnai Talas, the butler's assistant or hallman in the richly furnished house at No. 4 East 79th street, this unoffending woman, 63 years old, only beginning to recover from the shock of her husban's death in a foreign land, was done to death in her luxurious library by masked thieves into whose hands she and her cherished jewels had been betrayed by one of her own household retainers.

Mrs. Nichols' death, while caused directly by shock due to the struggle with her assailants, came from the failure of a heart already weakenede by chronic disease. Save for a few superficial abrasions on the forehead, received in the brief struggle, Mrs. Nichols' body showed not the slightest marks of violence. The fingers were not even bruised where her valuable rings had been hastily removed by the robbers. This will be the testimony not only of Dr. Otto T. Schultz, Assistant State Medical Examiner, and Dr. Benjamin Schwartz, Coroner's physician, who conducted the autopsy in theu ndertaking establishment of William J. Minor, No. 405 Fifth avenue, but also of the undertaker him self, who made a minute examination of the body before the autopsy.

Inspector Joseph Faurot, chief of the Detective Bureau, who was at work indefatigably on the case all of Wednesday night and all of yesterday without sleep and until late in the afternoon, exploded early in the day the report that Mrs. Nichols had been strangled by a towel twisted about her throat. When the body was found lying across the threshhold of the library there was a sheetw rapped about Mrs. Nichols' head, but the inspector says that had been done evidently in the effort to silence her outcries and not for the purpose of strangling her. The police are convinced that the thieves, after successfully stripping from their victim her watch and such rings as she wore with the neglige house gown in which she was dressed, were so frightened by her collapse and apparent death that they made their escape from the house in a panic of fear.

Safe's Contents Intact.

Though it was true, as reported, that the key to Mrs. Nichols' strong box, in which she kept the major part of the jewels, reported to be worth several hundreds of thousands of dollars, was worn attached to a cord about her neck and tucked into the back of her bodice, and though the thieves probably were well aware of that custom, both cord and key were found intact upon her body, and the strong box with its wealth of jewels remained unopened until it was unlocked by Maitland F. Griggs, Mrs. Nichols' nephew, an attorney, who, accompanied by his wife, came to the city from Ardsley on Hudson and found the contents of the safe intact.

Even though it be clear that heart failure was the immediatec ause of Mrs. Nichols' death, that fact is not likely to relieve her assailants from the onus of a charge of murder. Under the statutes, lawyers say, where death ensues as the direct result of the commission of a felony, such as robbery, the crime comes within the legal definition of murder in the first degree. The absence of homicidal intent, however, may make the task of the state in obtaining a conviction a more difficult one.

BOB FITZSIMMONS FARM SOLD BY SHERIFF

New York, Sept. 10.—Sheriff Houghton of Middlesex county, N. J., has sold under mortgage foreclosure the farm of "Bob" Fitzsimmons, the pugilist, at West Dunellen. The sale was to satisfy a claim of Cornelius See, a lawyer of Chicago, who took part in the divorce proceedings against Fitzsimmons by his third wife, Julia Gifford. There were several other executions against the Fitzsimmons property, one held by Joseph Hendricks, of Atlantic City; another by Temo Sloniun, Fitzsimmons' fourth wife, and a third by Charles Cowenhoven of Metuchen.

Mr. See's claim was for $400, and the farm was sold to Mr. Hendricks for $100. The purchaser will satisfy the remaining claims against the property. Fitzsimmons made a fight to keep the property, having the sale postponed four times. The last postponement was made upon his statement that his fourth wife had gone away with jewels owned by his third wife and valued at $80,000, and that he expected his fourth wife to return with the property. The woman did not return and the sheriff made the sale. Fitzsimmons is now in Newark.

"WHEN DREAMS COME TRUE"

The announcement is made that "When Dreams Come True," one of the newest musical comedies, which had a great vogue in New York and Chicago last season, will be presented at the Wieting Opera House Sept. 13th to the 18th, "State Fair Week," with matinees Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

The action of the play opens on board the emmigrant deck of a steamship on its way to New York. The plot begins to unfold early and the music theme begins when William Pruette, Jr., as "Kean Hedges," the son of a multi-millionaire, who, on account of having become infatuated with a French dancer in Paris, is recalled to America by his father. Being short of funds, he has to take his passage home in the steerage of the ship, and it is while he is lonely he sees as he thinks in a vision, his dream girl. When the ship reaches the dock, the girl of the dream becomes a reality and romance runs merrily till the end.

A number of tuneful songs are introduced, chief among them being "Come Along to the Movies," "Love is Such a Funny Little Thing," "You, Dear, You," "Who's the Little Girl?" and "When Dreams Come True."

The scenic appointments are elaborate, and the costuming of the various members shows the very latest European fashions.

The company numbers fifty people with a large singing and dancing contingent, selected for their youth, grace and ability.

"When Dreams Come True," it is promised, will be one of the most enjoyable theatrical entertainments of the season. Prices for the engagement are: Matinees 50c, 75c and $1. Nights, 50c, 75c, $1 and $1.50. Mail orders addressed to F. P. Martin, Manager Wieting Opera House, Syracuse, N. Y., with express or post office money order and self-addressed stamped envelope for return will be filled in order of their receipt.

COUNTY COMMITTEEMEN NOMINATED BY DEMS.

Everything in the Democratic camp looks serene, no fight being apparent between the regulars and the antis organization men. This same situation obtains all over the county, it is said. The nominations have been of course filed and the complete list of county committeemen follows:

COUNTY FRUIT GROWERS GET STORAGEHOUSE PLANS

The Oswego County Fruit Growers' Co-operative Association has received from Dr. D. S. Beckwith, of Albion a plan for securing a cold storage plant in Oswego, upon which the association plans to get to work soon.

Mr. Beckwith favors reinforced concrete with cork insulation as the best type of building and urged that in any plant which might be put up adequate space be provided for teams, loading trucks, etc.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?"

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves every more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in said Miss Grayson quietly, interrupting his reverie.

Miss Mary Grayson was as pretty as her name. Her big round eyes, that were too full of merry shrewdness to be merely doll-like, her dazzling teeth, her clear and rosy skin, her well bred figure and attractive way of dressing, made up a whole that old Martin never saw without some inward breathing of contentment. Old Martin looked up at her now with a sigh.

"Well, how are you today, Mistress Mary?" he said aloud.

"Very well indeed, thank you, Mr. Martin. I'm always well," said Miss Grayson. "Have you any letters for me today?"

They had got into the way for the last six weeks or so of having her come up to the house occasionally when Mr. Martin did not feel equal to going to the office.

"Yes, a few. But there's no hurry," he answered presently.

"Oh, by the way, Miss Grayson," he went on, "Johnson tells me you were here when that countess called this afternoon. What did you make of her?"

"Nothing, I'm sorry to say, Mr. Martin," replied Mary, laughing. "It was really too funny. I feel as Johnson said, that my education has been neglected. 'I regret that I was not better educated, ma'am,' he said to me."

"It was really too funny."

Mary went on in imitation of Johnson's inimitable manner. "'Nothing like this has ever happened to me before, miss, but I can't make her comprehend anything I say. She just sits and waits.'"

"What was she like?" demanded Mr. Martin, laughing too.

"Well, she was really rather fascinating," Mary began, taking her cue from this encouragement. "And stunning too. The French always are, don't you think? And she had on a duck of a dress. She walked straight in and looked straight at me and began to jabber like a streak of lightning. The French fairly flew out of her mouth. I told her it was impossible for her to see Mr. Martin—that he was confined to the house by a severe attack of gout, and couldn't she leave her message?"

"And did she?"

"Well, her message sounded something like this: 'JedesireparlieramonsieurmartinaproposdesAFFAIRES. Jesuisrichemaisonpeuttoujoursetreplus-RICHE. Sijepouvaisobtenirleagencedusavonmartinpourlafrancecaseraitunebelle AFFAIRE. Jedonneraicinquantemillefrancespour cetteAGGENCE. * * *'"

Mr. Martin's mouth fell open with amused astonishment during this tirade. He had once met a young woman who could make a noise like Sara Bernhardt without knowing more than half a dozen words of French. But Mary Grayson beat her.

"Well, well," laughed Mr. Martin; "it's a wonderful language, French."

"Isn't it," said Mary. "So finally we tried signs and pantomime. I made a wild, sweeping gesture at her to show that you were out. She rattled on worse than before. Then I pretended Johnson was you, Mr. Martin, and I shoved him out of the door and shrieked 'out!' Sometimes if you talk loud enough it seems as if they might understand you, but this one didn't. And then she began to act at Johnson and me too: She evidently wanted to know when you'd be back, whereupon I ran over to the clock and pointed violently to the figure 8.

"I told Johnson never to let her in again unless Marie was here to interpret her," said Mary in conclusion.

"Quite right," said Mr. Martin. "By the way," he added, eying his pretty secretary shrewdly, "do you think she was after Rodney? Was she young enough for that?"

"Some women are never too old for that, are they, Mr. Martin?" she said coolly.

He glanced at her furtively a moment, as she patted back her hair, looking pleasantly at the crackling fire. There had been a time in those early days, when she had first come to him, to try her hand at a secretaryship, when she had reminded him alternately of her two parents. It was in loyalty to one of them that he had given her a chance. Sometimes, in a flash, there would be a curiously vivid suggestion of her mother in her—something in the way she raised her head and looked at him, a sound in the tone of her voice as she said good morning. Such moments, for a long time, gave old Martin a sharp pang that he could not ignore even in his inmost heart. Then there was that even sharper twinge, and a curiously less pleasant one, when she reminded him of her father. He had been a handsome dog in his day, Rob Grayson—there was no denying that.

An idea was taking shape in Mr. Martin's brain pan; if only he could put it over.

CHAPTER II.

The Course of True Love.

"WELL, if you're ready, my dear, here goes," Mr. Martin began briskly to his stenographer, Mary Grayson.

To John Clark, Esq., Soap Works, New York, N. Y.:

Dear Sir—Confirming our conversation of even date I send you a line to record the bet made this morning between us in re our sons, Ellery Clark and Rodney Martin respectively—namely, that if my boy, by his own unaided efforts, isn't making more money at the end of a year from Nov. 1 next than your boy makes, I pay you thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) in cash; and if he is, then you pay that sum to me; the books of their several business concerns, duly audited, to be the deciding factor. Yours very truly,

"Got that?" he added, darting a keen glance at Mary beneath his thick eyebrows.

"Yes, Mr. Martin," said that young lady in a voice which she was evidently trying to make as colorless as possible.

"Well, what do you think of it?" demanded Mr. Martin, breaking a short pause.

"I think Mr. Rodney has more brains than you give him credit for," said Mary impulsively.

"Oh, you do, do you?"

"Yes, sir, I do. But isn't $30,000 a good deal of money to lose on a bet? Somebody always loses, you know. And Mr. Rodney has never had any business experience to speak of. You wouldn't have him in your own works, you know."

"Of course I wouldn't. I didn't want Rod posing there as the boss' son, interfering with the good discipline of the establishment. Besides, I didn't want them all down there to see what a nincompoop he was in business. I've got more pride than that."

"Aren't you a little hard on Rodney, Mr. Martin?" asked Mary gently.

"Are you a little sweet on Rodney, Miss Mary?" retorted the soap king gruffly.

She had her head bent over her work, and he couldn't see her features during this colloquy. He would have to carry the plummet line a little deeper.

"Because if you are," he went on, "I warn you, you'll have to marry him for love. He'll get no money from me unless he makes good. I shall make a will leaving him only an annuity, the principal to go to charity when he has idled himself into his grave, and I'll see to it that the annuity isn't quite enough for two, let me tell you, let alone a family of kids. I don't propose to have him or a lot of worthless grandbrats making ducks and drakes of my money when I'm gone."

"I see," said Miss Grayson. "Of course it's none of my business. Anything else, sir?"

A motor bus screeching along outside came to a full stop at the corner. Mr. Martin, who had begun to pace the room as he talked, forgetting his convenient or inconvenient gout, lingered at the window and saw two women alight and stand talking indefinitely on the sidewalk. In one of the window panes where the curtains darkened it and made a mirror he could see Mary's pretty head drooping a little, giving her body a suddenly pensive air as she gazed abstractedly into the dying fire. He turned and spoke again and was pleased to see that she started involuntarily.

"Would you mind ringing for Johnson, my dear?" he asked, more pleasantly.

Mary rose and pressed the button and then sat down again as before. Johnson came presently and obediently replenished the fire, while Cyrus Martin twiddled his keys and small change in his trousers pockets. When Johnson's stiff back had disappeared through the doorway he began again on another tack.

"Look here, Mary," he demanded in a franker tone. "I want your help. You can help me if you will, and if you benefit by it yourself, why so much the better. Pitch in and catch Rodney if you want him. I should be glad of it. Only there would be one condition."

Beneath this direct attack the girl did finally blush a little. She gathered herself together again, however, and folded up her book by way of recapturing her composure.

"Why, Mr. Martin," she said, "what an idea!"

"Why is it such an idea? Is there nothing to attract a young fellow and a good looking girl like you to each other? You're too modest, Miss Mary."

"I'm not a judge of that, Mr. Martin," said Mary.

"Oh, yes, you are!" retorted her employer. "And I'm not so sure you're not quite willing myself."

"But I think you're very unkind to me," protested Mary, taking another cue. "You appeal to my woman's curiosity. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that your son and I are madly in love with each other, what are your conditions?"

"Well," said her employer, "I tell you frankly I don't want to lose that $30,000 to John Clark, and I do want to stir Rodney up. He needs an incentive, and I've been ransacking my brains to find the right one. And I think I've found it. I think it's you."

"I, Mr. Martin? Do you really think so?" she expostulated demurely.

"Yes, I do really think so, Miss Grayson," he mimicked.

"Don't you think it's just perversity?" persisted Mary. "Do you think Rodney would really care about me if he could have me just for the asking? I don't see how I can help you at all."

"Oh, yes, you can! And I'll tell you just how," went on Old Martin trenchantly. "I want Rodney to work for his money and his wife together. I'm going to turn him out of here"—

"Turn him out, Mr. Martin? Whatever do you mean?"

"I think you're very unkind to me."

"Just what I say—turn him out, throw him overboard. Didn't you ever hear of the old admiral who taught his children to swim by throwing them overboard? The girls as well as the boys. If they didn't drown they swam, he said. But they usually swam."

"But they might have drowned," objected Mary, with a pretty shudder.

"No," said old Cyrus, with a villain's chuckle, "I've got it all doped out. I'll turn him out, right enough. I'll find a good excuse for it. I'm mad enough with him half the time. Look here, Mary, has Rodney proposed to you yet?"

"Well, really, Mr. Martin," stammered the secretary, "do you really think"—

"Well, the next time he proposes you're to accept him. See? You're to tell him you'll have him if his father consents, and then send him to ask me. That'll be my big scene."

"You'll say yes—you'll refuse?" stuttered Mary, showing some concern in the success of the plot, despite her efforts to be detached and businesslike.

"Consent? No! That's my cue for turning him out of my house forever," roared the stage father, working him-

Breaded Tongue.
Potato Salad. Biscuits.
Olives. Salted Nuts.
Fruit. Cake. Tea.

BREADED TONGUE.—Cut cold boiled fresh or corned tongue into slices about half an inch thick. Egg and breadcrumb them and saute in butter. Saute an equal number of rounds of bread cut about the same size and lay each piece of tongue upon a round of bread. Pour around a tomato sauce or a sauce made as follows: Add a little butter if needed to that in the pan in which both tongue and bread were fried. Put in a rounding tablespoonful of flour and stir until brown, then add a cupful of stock, a teaspoonful of finely minced parsley, a teaspoonful of lemon juice and a tablespoonful of chopped pickles.

Beet and Celery Salad.—Mix equal quantities of chopped boiled beets and chopped crisp celery. Moisten with a boiled dressing made as follows: Mix together one-half teaspoonful each of dry mustard and white pepper, one teaspoonful of salt and one teaspoonful of sugar. Stir in the beaten yolks of two eggs. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in one-half cupful of hot vinegar. Cook one teaspoonful of sweet milk slowly over the egg yolks, then very slowly stir in the vinegar and butter. Let just come to a boil again, remove from the fire and cool. Whip the whites of the eggs to a very stiff snow and fold them lightly in the cooled dressing.

Marble Cake.—Cream half a cupful of butter, two cupfuls of sugar and the yolks of four eggs. Add a cupful of milk, half a teaspoonful of vanilla and three and a half cupfuls of flour sifted with three and a half teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Lastly fold in the white of four eggs beaten stiff. Divide into three parts and bake two in layers. To the third add a quarter of a teaspoonful of cinnamon, a third of a cupful each of chopped figs and raisins and a tablespoonful of molasses. Put the dark layer between the light ones, with jelly between.

Scalloped Onions.—Boil onions until tender, cut them in quarters and put them in a baking dish. Season, cover with white sauce and fine crumbs and brown in the oven.

STUNNING COSTUME.

Brown Faille Silk Makes Handsome Foil For Furs.

FOR THE AUTUMN MAID.

Why has ultra modish femininity worn furs all summer? No one will ever know, and now the fox has slyly crept into the fashionable picture for autumn, and we see him everywhere—in the shop windows and prowling about milady's neck and hanging over her arm in the shape of a muff. Shown here the beautiful color of the fur is an excellent foil against the background of golden brown faille silk, of which the one piece frock is built.

WHO PAYS HER SALARY?

Miss Charlotte Rumbold's Request Refused Because She Is Not a Voter.

Miss Charlotte Rumbold, supervisor of recreation in St. Louis, has been refused a salary by the St. Louis city fathers, has rejected the offer of the women to have her salary made up by donations from the City club and has resigned her position. She believes the workman is worthy of his hire.

She believes that a workwoman is worthy of her hire also—that is, she thinks that salaries should be paid according to the task and not according to the sex of the worker.

She brought the municipal playground and recreation facilities of St. Louis up to their present standard, which is the boast of St. Louis. The work has grown from one playground—instituted, by the way, by the Wednesday club (of women)—to many playgrounds. The first was given on the condition that some woman approved by the Wednesday club be put in charge of it. Now there is an entire system of recreation grounds serving nearly every part of the city.

Miss Rumbold has not taken a vacation since she began work. Recently, however, she asked that her salary "be raised to what it is reasonably worth as measured by salaries paid for similar work in other cities." This the board of aldermen decided it could not do because "Miss Rumbold is not a voter. The taxes of the city are paid by men, not women," said the board, and that fact governed it in refusing Miss Rumbold's request.

The women of St. Louis sat up then and began to take notice. They asked each other: "How about this question of taxes? Do we not pay them?" These are some of the things they have found out about themselves:

The state of Missouri has between a third and one-half as many single women paying an income tax as it has single men. "Of the 9,500 married men who pay income taxes, do not their wives share in this payment?" they asked the wives. The wives uttered just one word—"Yes."

St. Louis out of its 350,000 women permits nearly 75,000 to work as wage earners for the increase of its wealth. "Where do these women belong in the city's economic development?" asked the roused St. Louis women.

Out of all the great number of housekeepers in the city who pay taxes indirectly on everything their households eat and wear, who save out of their household budgets for the tax collector's demands, only 947 receive wages—that is, less than 1,000 housekeepers are counted self supporting.

Now the women of St. Louis are gathering themselves into a Woman Voter league, and it is said that some of St. Louis' biggest women taxpayers will rally to its banner.

Before Miss Rumbold left for New York the Town club gathered to bid her farewell. The president of the club, Alma Gibson Robb, called upon all her members to come and assure Miss Rumbold of their unqualified approval of her stand on the woman question. "As a woman of whom we are all proud we bid her godspeed."

LONG COATS ARE STYLE FEATURES.

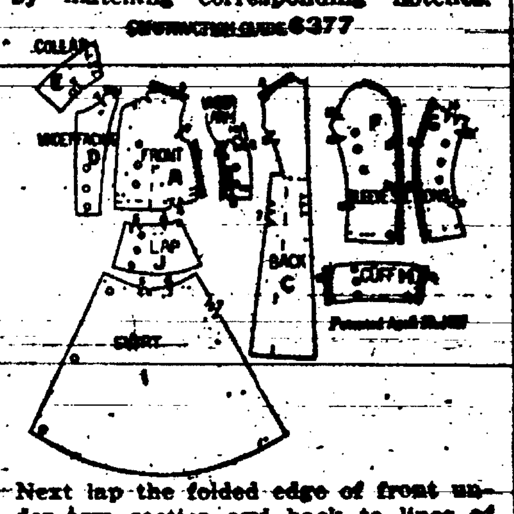
Tailored costume in crown black gabardine with one of the new long coats with flaring sides and panel back.

In the wide diversity of tailored costumes shown for the Fall, models with coats that reach almost to the edge of the dress skirt are attracting attention. The model shown here is a type of the latest style, the coat having a wide flare at the sides, while the back is in panel style. Using 54-inch serge, the costume requires 5 yards for skirt and coat.

Because the coat is adapted to use as a separate wrap, its construction is of particular interest to the home dressmaker. As a preliminary to its development, pleat the front, creasing on line of slot perforations, bring folded edge to corresponding line of small "o" perforations and press; stitch underneath pleat invisibly, in dart effect. Center-front indicated by line of small "o" perforations. Adjust underfacing to position underneath front, corresponding edges even. Join front, under-arm and back as notched, close shoulder seam as notched. Face collar and sew to neck edge as notched, center-backs even, leaving collar free forward of large "O" perforation. Turn under the lower edge of front and under-arm section, and the side edge of back, on slot perforations and baste.

The pocket lap may be of contrasting material if preferred, and this is arranged to position on the skirt section by matching corresponding notches.

CONSTRUCTION GUIDE 6377



Next lap the folded edge of front under-arm section and back to lines of small "o" perforations in skirt, center-fronts and corresponding notches even (large "O" perforations in skirt section indicate center-front); stitch to position at upper edge of skirt section, press pleat and close seam under pleat, indicated by triple notches.

For the sleeves close seams as notched, easing any fulness between notches at elbow. Turn hem at lower edge on small "o" perforations. If sleeve is desired without cuffs, cut off hem ⅝ inch below small "o" perforations; close cuff seam as notched, face and sew to sleeve, single large "O" and double small "oo" perforations even. Sew sleeve in armhole as notched, easing in any fulness.

It will be noted on the latest coats that large revers and shawl collars have no place, as smart models are made plain in front, with a side-fastening emphasized by large, fancy buttons.

Pictorial Review Coat No. 6377. Sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust. Price, 15 cents.

NAVY BLUE SUIT.

Smart Tailleur Not Complete Without the Inevitable Fox Set.

AN AUTUMN COSTUME.

The gowns for autumn show many ripples. The coat is rippled and also the skirt, though by no means is it overdone. In fact, the autumn tailleur is nothing if not conservative. This suit is developed in navy blue gaberdine. The shoes are black and white and also the hat, while this magnificent set of red fox completes a very nobby and fashionable costume.

Be Careful.

"We were slowly starving to death," remarked the famous explorer at the boarding house table, "but we cut up our boots and made soup of them and thus sustained life."

"Sh-h-h! Not so loud!" exclaimed the dyspeptic boarder. "The landlady might hear you."—Wisconsin State Journal.

GOMPERS FOR SUFFRAGE.

Matter of Common Justice to Give Women Vote They Ask, He Says.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in an address before the Women's Trade Union league convention held recently in New York city, said in part:

"Some people say I'm deeply sentimental. I hope I shall not live an hour after I lose my sentiment. But those who know me say I'm practical, and I view woman suffrage from the practical side. It is a matter of common justice.

"If it is an objection that women know little of the value of the vote I can point to millions of men who know nothing of its value. I don't know whether the antis should be spelled 'anti' or 'auntie.'

"First of all I am a trade unionist. I am not an advocate of strikes, but I never yet ran away from one. Make the preparation to strike if necessary. We want protocols, but the labor movement in America does not depend for its success upon protocols.

"I also want to make this plea to you men present. On election day, when the question of a constitutional amendment for suffrage comes up, vote the ballot yes."

Labor Unions Back President.

The heads of international trades unions, with half a million members, comprising the building trades department of the American Federation of Labor, in recent session at Atlantic City, N. J., voted decisively against a peace at any price protest to President Wilson.

After debating for more than an hour an appeal from Representative Frank Buchanan, Seventh Illinois district, that the building trades be enlisted in a nation wide movement to influence the course of the White House administration against any possibility of war with Germany the leaders flatly refused.

In a terse statement council officials explained that they regarded it as a patriotic duty to stand back of the president and avoid any action tending to embarrass his conduct of a great national task.

An Island Wilderness.

Andros island, among the Bahamas, is ninety miles in length and twenty to forty miles in breadth, and most of its extensive area has never been explored. It is an unbroken wilderness, inhabited solely by about 3,500 negroes. It has great forests, seldom penetrated by white men, but no real effort has been made to exploit its resources.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Sprains.

A sprain is due to the stretching and tearing of the ligaments around a joint. It usually is accompanied by great pain and swelling. Hot water applications are the best to relieve the pain and reduce the swelling. The injured joint should be kept absolutely at rest. A good way to secure this is to strap the joint for some distance above and below with adhesive plaster, layer upon layer. If there is a weak spot in the dressing it can be strengthened by another layer or so. Care should be taken to see that the plaster is not so tight as to interfere with the circulation. It is easy to determine this by noting whether the parts below the dressing remain warm. If they do not it is a sure sign that the dressing has impeded the circulation of blood. If this is the case loosen the bandage sufficiently to allow the blood to flow normally.

"Father," asked the boy, "what is a vacuum, and where can I find one?"

"My boy," replied the good man, "if we are to assume that your mother is qualified to speak on the subject I possess the only real vacuum in the neighborhood, and, for your further information, it is situated just between my collar and the glossy open space where I used to grow hair."

JEFF'S TESTIMONY

By SARAH ATWATER

Willard Trevor, a young man in Alabama, on opening his morning mail read a letter which astonished him. It contained a notification that he had been sued for breach of promise. His father had recently died and left him the care of several children, the sons and daughters of a second wife. Trevor had secured the services of a woman to take care of the children, but being dissatisfied with her had discharged her. A lawyer had written that Martha Broadhead, the complainant, would listen to an offer with a view to compromising the suit.

At the moment Trevor was reading this letter his body servant, Jeff, named for the future president of the Southern Confederacy, came into the room with his master's boots that he had shined.

"Jeff," said Trevor. "What do you suppose Miss Broadhead has done? She's sued me for breach of promise."

"Yes, sah."

"She wishes to extort money. She will attempt to prove that I made love to her while she was here in charge of the children. I'm going to call upon you to tell the court that, though you were in the house all the time she was here, if I had been sweet on her you would have noticed it and that you never saw any courting going on between us."

"Yes, sah."

When Jeff was called to the stand by Trevor's counsel he testified as his master had indicated and was about to step down from the witness box when Miss Broadhead's counsel called upon him to remain for cross examination.

"Jeff," he said patronizingly and intending to ingratiate himself with the witness before attempting to get any information out of him that would injure his master's case, "you find Mr. Trevor a very good master, don't you?"

"Berry good mastah, sah."

"You say that you are a house servant?"

"Yes, sah."

"And that you never saw your master sitting in the parlor or on the gallery with Miss Broadhead?"

"No, sah. I didn't nebber see mars' sotten in de parlor or on de gallery with Missy Broadhead, but I see him on de gallery oncet talkin' with Missy Broadhead."

"You saw Mr. Trevor on the gallery talking with Miss Broadhead, eh? Well, what was he saying to her?"

"He tole Miss Broadhead ef ebber he cotched her slappin' one ob de chilluns ag'in he gib her de walkin' papers."

The spectators tittered, and the judge called them to order. The attorney colored a bit, then proceeded.

"How was your master in the habit of spending his evenings?"

"Sometimes he went out to call on de neighbors, and sometimes he sot in de library readin'."

"And how did Miss Broadhead spend her evenings?"

"Missy Broadhead she put de chillun to bed."

"About what time did she get the children to sleep?"

"Dunno, sah. I nebber see her up but oncet."

"What was she doing then?"

"Missy Broadhead went to de library where Mars' Willard was sottin' readin' a book."

"Well, what happened between them?"

"Missy Broadhead says, says she: 'I'm gwine to run ovah to Missy Cuthbert's fo' a few minutes. If any ob de chillun wakes up I'll be back in time so you won't be boddered.' And mars' says, 'Dat all right; don't hurry yo'self.' I was gwine to Missy Cuthbert's myself to see her cullud gal, Peggy, so I follered Missy Broadhead as fa' as de crossroad, and she turned on de crossroad. Since she wasn't gwine to Missy Cuthbert's I jist think I'd see whar she war gwine, so I follered her down de road, and she met de oberseer."

This was evidence that the attorney had not bargained for. He would have stopped the testimony, but he knew that the defendant's counsel would call it forth anyway, so he felt obliged to let Jeff go on. The darky resumed:

"De oberseer tuk Missy Broadhead in he arms, and I heard a smack lak de repo't ob a pistol."

After the laugh that this evidence elicited had subsided Jeff continued:

"Den dey walked togedder on de road, talkin. I bein' black as de night de white folks couldn't see me, but I could see de white folks, and, climbin' ober de fence, I trubeled in de field alongside ob 'em. I hearn Missy Broadhead say dat mars' hab a heap o' money an' he'd rudder pay than go into cou't. Den de oberseer he say, 'Yo' hain't got nottin' fo' to hire a lawyer.' And Missy Broadhead says, says she, 'I nebber thought o' dat.' And de oberseer he says, says he, 'I furnish de money fo' de lawyer and fo' de cou't.' And Missy Broadhead, she says, says she, 'If yo' do dat I gib yo' half.'"

Naturally every one in the courtroom listened to this evidence with wrapt attention except the plaintiff and her counsel. When Jeff had finished the judge dismissed the case, and the defendant threw his arms around Jeff and hugged him. Plaintiff's counsel gave notice that he would appeal the case on the ground that a slave's testimony was not admissible, but the appearance of guilt in the plaintiff at his testimony indicated that she would not press her complaint further, and she never did.

Trevor offered Jeff his freedom, but Jeff had been born and lived on the plantation sixty years, and said his master might as well "pull up a tree by de roots and throw it into de road."

H. B. KINNEY ASKS FOR LETTERS ON ESTATE

H. B. Kinney of this city has asked for letters on the estate of Henry Kinney, who died in Palermo August 1. He left property valued at $2,000, real estate $900 and $1,100 personal.

The children are to share equally in the property.

Letters were asked by Mary J. Baker on the estate of Irving A. Baker, who died here August 8, leaving $1,150 personal property.

DR. AND MRS. SIMONS RETURN TO ALBANY HOME

Dr. and Mrs. Fred B. Simons of Albany, who have been visiting Mrs. Simons' parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Sanford, of South 3rd st., returned to their home by motor yesterday.

Dr. Simons is in the employment of the government and Mrs. Simons is superintendent of the Regents department at Albany. Mrs. Simons is also the author of two text books used in school work.

Good Spellers.

Just the other day some one paused to remark that certain people who wore Ph. Ds., and other mysterious letters, denoting scholarship, after their names, were sometimes very poor spellers. The fact was recognized by a person taking part in the conversation and a third attempted to explain the situation. Said he:

"Some people simply have spelling left completely out of their makeups. They can no more spell than others can tell the key when a few chords are played on a piano. They simply have no sound sense and letters incorrectly arranged are the result."

While there may be something in that theory, poor spelling is certainly more a matter of man's shortcomings that it is of nature's.

According to Professor Thomas A. Knott of the Chicago University summer school "English is not spelled. It is misspelled." Professor Knott indicts the language on five counts. They are:

1. There are not enough characters in the alphabet to represent the sounds.

2. Some of the characters are superfluous. These are the letters C, Q and X.

3. Myriads of letters in written words are never pronounced.

4. We spell each sound in from one to thirteen different ways.

After setting forth his reasons, which no doubt will be good news to the poor spellers of the country, the professor goes the way of many a critic and omits any suggestion of a remedy. He is convinced that the teaching of modern spelling always must be difficult, because it is not a rational process. "Reason and logic," Professor Knott says, "are as far apart from ability to spell as the north star is from the southern cross."

While the good professor is undoubtedly sincere in his criticism, the fact remains that a great many people strive each day to become better spellers and great numbers make remarkable progress, considering the time devoted to the cultivation of this exceedingly good faculty. Logic or no logic, a person should try to be a good speller. And most of the poor ones can improve wonderfully if they will only try hard and often enough.—Batavia News.

HOME RULE CLAUSE MAY GO TO VOTERS

Albany, Sept. 10.—At the conclusion of a conference of Elihu Root, George W. Wickersham and other leading majority members of the Constitutional convention it was stated that the home rule article of the revised constitution probably will be submitted separately to the voters of the state.

Mr. Root received word from some of the leading democrats of New York City and from other delegates from other cities that the policemen are much opposed to the home rule clause, because it does not guarantee the right of appeal to members of the police forces.

Teachers, also, it is stated, have some very set opinions regarding a number of parts of the home rule article relating to salaries.

FLEETEST OF ALL DOGS.

Greyhounds Can Run as Fast as Carrier Pigeons Can Fly.

Comparatively few people realize of what remarkable speed dogs are capable. The wolf can run between fifty and sixty miles in one night, and the arctic fox can do quite as well, if not better. Nansen met one of these foxes on the ice at a point more than seventy miles northwest of the Sannikow territory, which is 480 miles from the Asiatic coast. Eskimo and Siberian dogs can travel forty-five miles on the ice in five hours, and there is one case on record in which a team of Eskimo dogs traveled six and one-half miles in twenty-eight minutes.

English setters and pointers hunt at the rate of eighteen to nineteen miles an hour, and they can maintain the speed for at least two hours. Foxhounds are extraordinarily swift, as is proved by the fact that a dog of this breed once beat a thoroughbred horse, covering four miles in six and one-half minutes. Greyhounds are the swiftest of all four footed creatures, and their speed may be regarded as equal to that of carrier pigeons. English greyhounds which are carefully selected and which are used for coursing are able to cover at full gallop a space between eighteen and twenty-three yards every second. It is said that a hare at its greatest speed never goes faster than at the rate of eighteen yards a second. These interesting statistics fully prove the right of the greyhounds to rank as the swiftest of the quadrupeds.—Springfield Republican.

FINANCEERS IN NEW YORK TO GET LOAN

New York, Sept. 10.—In the famous Morgan private library in Madison avenue, historic for momentous financial conferences in times of crisis, America's most powerful bankers this afternoon, on the invitation of J. P. Morgan, will hold a three hours' session with the Anglo-French banking commission due to arrive here on the Lapland this morning, according to a wireless received late last night.

Plans will be taken up for the flotation of the largest loan the United States has ever known. The total needs of the allies may exceed $1,000,000,000—a thousand million—although the initial issues are unlikely to call for more than $500,000,000.

Every important city in the country will be asked to co-operate in insuring the success of the loan. I understand the Federeal Reserve banks are prepared to facilitate America's unparelleled foreign trade by re-discounting the bills, based on exports to European countries.

U. S. DOCTORS DOING BIG WORK IN SERBIA

London, Sept. 10.—The sanitary work being done by the United States in Servia is attracting attention all over Europe. An international Sanitary Commission has been established, with Sir Ralph Paget as chairman, and the country roughly apportioned between the different co-operating nations.

The United States has charge of the work in the south, and theb urden it is bearing continually increases. Dr. Strong, in charge of the United States work, is an exceptional man of wide experience, and has behind him practically the unlimited resources of the wonderful Rockefeller Foundation. Twenty-five additional American doctors are expected to arrive shortly at Salonika, the advance guard of a contingent of 150. As they arrive they will be sent to various parts of Servia, where their services are most needed.

FIGHTING DRUGS AND ALCOHOLISM: WHAT ONE MAN DID IN 14 YEAR BATTLE

Charles B. Towns Tells How One May Be Permanently Cured of Habit.

Ravages of Narcotics and Liquors In United States Are Worse Than Tuberculosis.

THIS is the story of a modern St. George and his titanic struggle with a herd of modern dragons. The St. George is Charles B. Towns, American citizen born and bred, resident of New York, and the dragons are those deadly and devastating habits which have put such an alarmingly large proportion of humanity in this day and age under their subjection, to wit—the drug habit and alcohol addiction.

But Mr. Towns goes further than the valiant St. George of mythological fame. St. George simply fought with the dragon and laid him low; Mr. Towns fights his dragons and their ubiquitous progeny. He also spends his might and main in reclaiming some of the human devastation wrought by those foul fiends, besides instructing and inspiring states and legislatures in the science of preventing through wise laws their further rise and frightful dominance in the fair field of human life.

The writer of this article has been privileged to see the advance proofs of Mr. Towns' forthcoming book, which deals with the menace of drugs, alcohol and tobacco and the remedy for those habits.

Charles B. Towns—the Man.

One expects to find Charles B. Towns an unusual personality. For a layman to have taken new principles like his, to have developed them into a practical method, to have perfected a technique which physicians seem unable to improve, to have struggled for years against professional prejudices and tradition, to have at length won the approbation, admiration and support of the most eminent men in the medical world, to have established a big institution, to have attracted the attention of the heads of some of the greatest industrial enterprises in the world—the great captains of industry—and to have become the trusted counselor of states and the instigator and virtual author of laws regulating the deadly traffic in drugs—these are things that could only be accomplished by an unusual personality. One is not disappointed.

How Towns Began His Great Work.

Mr. Towns has handled some 6,000 cases of drug and alcohol addiction and is at the present time handling between 1,000 and 1,500 a year. His taking up the work in 1901 was due almost entirely to an investigation into the methods employed to restore those who had lost control through the use of habit forming drugs. At that time such cases were supposed to be hopelessly incurable, and the victims drifted from bad to worse until they arrived either at the madhouse or the morgue.

On making inquiries from some of the leading medical men who had been dealing with the various types of mental and nervous diseases Mr. Towns learned that they were virtually unable to name any case of a confirmed drug user who had been permanently benefited by institutional or any other treatment. It seemed incredible to him that a skilled physician could not eliminate the craving or desire for the drug or restore these unfortunates to the point where their systems would not demand or feel the need of it. He soon found out why this was so. Investigation showed him that the drug habit is a mental as well as a physical condition; that the physiological action of an opiate is to tie up the functions, which results in a deterioration of the vital organs when the victim has taken the drug sufficiently long to set up a definite tolerance.

The medical world had apparently been unable or had not attempted to bring about, first of all, a definite physiological change and to put such patients in a physical state in which their systems would not demand their customary poison. To his further surprise he found that the medical world had been depending entirely on deprivation or gradual reduction of the dosage as a means of treating such cases.

Treating 4,000 Patients In China.

In 1908, when the Chinese government was carrying on its great fight against the use of opium, Mr. Towns with characteristic energy put his New York affairs in good hands and betook himself to China. He was sure that terrible mistakes would be made in such a campaign unless some one who knew the alpha and omega of drug taking were on the spot to point out the pitfalls and to throw light on this much misunderstood subject. He remained in China nearly a year, and at his own expense and in the face of obstacles that would have broken the will of any man only a little less determined he established four hospitals, at which 4,000 Chinese were successfully treated, passing on his method to others there when he returned to continue his work in America.

Some of Towns' Latest Exploits.

Apart from this remarkable exploit and from the regular work that is being carried on at his hospital in New York Mr. Towns has recently been the chief figure in two noteworthy undertakings—undertakings that are likely to be the forerunners of sociological regeneration on a large scale in respect of drug and alcohol addiction. Henry Ford, the automobile manufacturer, having become acquainted with Mr. Towns and having acquired a complete faith in his method of treating drug and alcohol victims, conceived a desire to install in his new hospital whatever might be necessary for the treatment of drug addiction and alcoholism. Accordingly he sent five patients from his factories to New York to take the Towns treatment, with a physician to learn the Towns technique. The patients were reported cured of their craving in less than a week, and the Towns method has now been definitely adopted by the Henry Ford hospital.

Mr. Towns has just finished the conducting of a clinic for a national committee working on the subject of prison reform, the results of which are expected to bring about a complete revolution throughout the country in the handling of prisoners addicted to drugs and alcohol.

A Much Misunderstood Matter.

Everybody knows something of the ravages of alcohol, though few realize the full extent and the ramifications of the scourge and tragedy of alcoholism. As to drug taking and its consequences, it may be said that the general public knows nothing of them beyond having a vague notion that there are some drug fiends, as they are called, in every large community and that they are usually looked upon as being degraded beings, beyond hope of regeneration.

It will come as a great surprise, therefore, to read the following lines in Mr. Towns' authoritative work: "Discussion of the drug problem in the press has until recently dealt wholly with those phases which make themselves manifest in the underworld or among the Chinese. * * * The world heard nothing of the blameless men and women who had become drug users as the result of illness. This seems strange since there are in the United States more victims of the drug habit than there are of tuberculosis. It is estimated that 15 per cent of the practicing physicians in the country are addicted to the habit, and, although I think this is an exaggeration, it is nevertheless true that habit forming drugs demand a heavy toll from the medical profession; wrecking able practitioners in health and reputation and, of course, seriously endangering the public."

Of the many physicians who have gone to Mr. Towns for help 99 per cent of them explained to him that their use of drugs was the direct outgrowth of their ignorance. And "if the man who has studied and who practices medicine is unaware of what will bring about the habit," pertinently asks Mr. Towns, "what can be expected of the medically uneducated citizen who is started on the dangerous road by those in whom he puts his faith—his doctors?" Clearly humanity must be protected from such an evil. "And the physician must be saved from it, for saving him will fulfill in a large measure the demand for the protection of the public."

Victims Unfairly Treated by Society

Mr. Towns is strongly of the opinion that up to the present time most drug takers have been unfairly treated by society. They have not been properly safeguarded from forming the habit or properly helped to overcome it. "It is criminally easy," he says, "for any one to acquire the drug habit. Few physicians have recognized that it is not safe for most persons to know what will ease pain. When an opiate is necessary it should be given only on prescription, and its presence should then be thoroughly disguised. A patient goes to a physician to be consult-

THE TRADE UNION.

That the trade union movement is the highest and best developed working class movement thus far evolved no thinking man can successfully dispute.

There is no effort so potent to accomplish tangible results in the material, economic, moral or social conditions as the great economic power of the trade union movement, which recognizes the identity, the fraternity, the solidarity of labor.

THE BRITISH WORKMEN.

Manufacturers Largely to Blame For Shortage of Munitions.

A remarkable analysis of the point of view of the English workman, given by a skilled laborer in the Quarterly Review, carries the conviction that the persons primarily to be blamed for the lack of British munitions are not the workmen but the manufacturers. "The workers have absolutely no idea of endangering the empire or of exposing our troops to added risks," he writes. "Their attention is concentrated on the notion that a state of war is being made the excuse for further exploiting them. Requests made before the war are still undealt with, while the cost of living has been much increased. Protest has been unavailing, hence the strikes—unfortunately in war time." The 10,000 strikers on the Clyde demanded an additional twopence long before there was any prospect of war. The great majority of these men had had no increase in pay for seventeen years, the increase then having been one halfpenny per hour. Their employers having disdained to give an answer to their demands, in spite of the vast volume of business and the war rise in the cost of necessities, they refused to work until an answer was given. In such cases as this the fault is obviously the manufacturer's, not the workman's.

An English workman has two facts thrown in his face each day, that his wages buy less than before the war and that the work he does is producing great profits for his factory in which he has no share. England can prevent strikes for the remainder of the war either by scouring the workmen into a superangelic state of mind, in which they will not care what becomes of them and their families because of their devotion to the men in the trenches, or by prodding the factory owners into parting with a portion of the wealth that the workers are producing.

The workmen admit that the war-time strike is wrong and that they ought to be willing to refrain from striking and to sacrifice their homes, families and ordinary bare comforts for the benefit of the men in the trenches. But they ask very humbly: "To prevent strikes, why should you not sacrifice a penny of your towering profits?" and they receive the answer, "Because we are the manufacturers."—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE MINIMUM WAGE.

Good Thing For Women, but Male Workers Do Not Need It.

Discussing the question of a minimum wage, John Mitchell, former head of the United Mine Workers and now chairman of the New York industrial commission, said:

I believe the legislature should have the power to fix a minimum wage for women and children, but not for men, because the men are able to take care of themselves through their unions. Unfortunately the women do not organize as the men do, and many a woman enters the industrial pursuits with the ultimate hope of becoming a home maker and is not so anxious to secure industrial rights through organization.

Wages for women now are lowered by girls who are supported at home, but who go to work to get what might be termed pin money to expend upon themselves and who do not aid in the support of their homes. This class of working girls is harmful to the class who are compelled to support themselves by their work, as they keep the latter's wages down. There is no demand for a minimum wage for men, and if you put such a provision in the revised constitution the laboring vote might defeat the whole instrument.

Chicago Traction Strike.

The extent of the Chicago traction strike is indicated by these figures:

Total number on strike, 14,000; miles of surface track affected, 1,095; miles of elevated affected, 915; surface passengers carried daily, 3,044,650; elevated passengers, 712,000; total carried out of Loop daily by elevated during evening rush, 166,300; income of surface lines daily, $86,000; income of elevated, $25,000; capitalization of surface lines, $140,000,000; capitalization of elevated lines $90,000,000.

Guards Sent to Prison.

The nine deputies who were convicted recently in Trenton, N. J., of having fired into a group of strikers at the Williams & Clark depot in Roosevelt were sentenced by Justice Bergen to terms of not less than two years nor more than ten years in state prison on each man. The convictions were for manslaughter.

TUMBLED FROM TREE, SUFFERED BROKEN WRIST

Up into a large horsechestnut tree climbed little John Neyhart, twelve years old, yesterday afternoon. John lost his grip and tumbled to mother earth which he struck with such force as to receive a severe shaking up and a fratcured wrist bone. John is the son of Mrs. Edith Neyhart of Hart st., whose prompt work in rushing the lad to Dr. Haviland's office in Oneida st., probably saved the young climber some hours of pain. Dr. Fox reduced the fracture.

New Bridges to Cost More Than First Estimate

Extra Expense Result of Employing Extra Labor and Materials by Contractor Styring Whose Work Has Reached Second Month's Estimate.

The Board of Public Works met last night to approve the second estimate of Edwin Styring, the contractor who is constructing the bridges on North First st. over the Hunter tail race and on Sixth st. over Waterhouse creek.

Mr. Styring's bid for the work on both bridges totaled $4,783.-05, but included in the estimate for the second month are several items for extra labor and materials which will bring the total cost of the work nearer $5.000.

In addition to approving the second estimate, the board voted the payment of several bills from the Water, Sprinking and Sewer Funds.

The figures of City Engineer Clayton Hill on the Styring work are as follows:

CITY'S BONDS REMAIN UNPRINTED, IN REPLY TO TAXPAYERS' COMMITTEE

Along the line of the assertions made by the Taxpayers' Committee that bonds issued by the city were not taken up by the bidders for some time, but were allowed to remain in the City Hall while the city paid a high rate of interest on them, a citizen asserted yesterday that the bonds issued at a meeting in July by the Common Council to cover the cost of last year's paving, which were bid in by a New York firm, which was to accept the bonds July 15, have not as yet been claimed by the bidders and are still at City Hall. This statement was verified this morning by a Times reporter.

The bonds are still in the city, although City Clerk Scudder admitted this morning that the bidder should have taken the bonds in July. Mr. Scudder accounted for the delay by saying the bonds have not been printed yet, and also because a New York law firm passes upon the bonds before they are finally accepted. As far as he knew, the bonds have been passed upon, but they have not yet been printed.

A Taxpayer Complains About Inability to Get Financial Statement

I notice that there seems to be a difference in the amount of the debt of the City of Fulton as stated by the "Taxpayers' Committee" and the Mayor. I have never seen a complete statement of said debt and think that there is good reason why all taxpayers should have exact knowledge regarding their indebtedness. If the city books are properly kept it ought not to be more than a few hours' work to make such a statement.

City Clerk Scudder always seems to be a very obliging official; will he not kindly furnish such list to the city papers, giving dates, maturities and rates of interest and, please don't forget, to include the city share of the bonds issued by the towns of Volney and Granby for railroad and bridges. Cannot you give it to us by the 17th? Mr. Scudder.

London Newspapers Approve President's Action in Dumba Case

London, Sept. 11.—The English Press is gratified by the dismissal of Dr. Dumba, holding that it was the only course open to the President.

The Daily Telegraph says: "Never has there been a more flagrant record of diplomatic misconduct than that of the Austrian Ambassador in his efferat to incite strikes and violence in the country to which he was accredited."

The Daily News, indorsing the President's act, says: "Count von Bernstorff is as deep in the mud as Dr. Dumba is in the mire. The impudent machinations of Dr. Dumba are only a step removed from the deliberate perjuries of Stahl, who swore that the Lusitania had four guns, in order to justify the wholesale murder of American men, women and children."

Denouncing the German reply to the Arabic note as a "thumping lie," the Daily News adds: "The sworn evidence of the passengers contradicts flatly the charge of the submarine commander that the liner attempted to ram him. The confession that he had time to submerge and discharge the torpedo has given the lie to his own story. Germany, moreover, transforms the apology into further wanton insult in the statement that, even if the submarine commander who killed the Americans made a mistake in assuming that the Arabic was about to attack, the German government cannot recognize the obligation for compensation. However, signs are accumulating that the limit of American patience has been reached."

"Germany's whole attitude toward the United States," says the Daily Express, "is in keeping with the impudent lie that the submarine commander torpedoes the Arabic and killed American citizens because the liner atempted to ram his vessel. Germany lied about the Lusitania and lies now about the Arabic. If the United States pays the slightest attention to this latest obvious invention she will be inviting Huns, like Dumba and Germany's submarine pirates, to indulge in further crimes against Americans by land and sea, and in further insults to the sovereign government of the United States."

The Daily Chronicle says: "The President has been very patient but when he strikes he strikes hard. America would have become the laughing stock of the nations if he had tolerated the continued presence as Ambassador of a man who had been fomenting strikes in hef industrial establishments. A grosser outrage against the internal peace of a great country cannot be conceived."

GERMANS HURLED BACK BY FRENCH ON LONG FRONT

London, Sept. 11.—Activity along the entire western front evidently foreshadows the beginning of the Allies' expected offensive. Artillery has now been in active operation for thirteen days, and such a bombardment usually precedes a forward move. The Belgians have been bombarding the German positions at the Yser Canal, the British are shelling their lines around Ypres and the French are attacking with their famous 75's the Germans in the Argonne and the hills of the Vosges.

In spite of the asphyxiating gas and flaming liquid, two German attempts to pierce the French lines in thel atter region failed. The Germans at first captured some trenches, but these were later retaken. The Germans obtained a brief footing on the summit of Hartmans-Weilerkopf on Thursday, but were driven down again during the night.

In the southeast the Austro-German advance has been checked by the two Russian successes on the Sereth river, where they made a big capture of guns and prisoners, but further north the Austrians have taken Dubno, the second of the big triangle of fortresses, and

Methodists of Early Years Tireless, Says Pioneer, Mr. Winget

Speaker Joined Denomination Before Civil War---Describes Free Methodism as Simple Form of Religion---Patrick Morgan Spoke Last Night.

The business sessions of the Susquehanna conference which are still in progress with an increasing attendance, reopened yesterday morning with devotional exercises, followed by a few timely and inspiring remarks by Bishop B. R. Jones. Several more pastors gave their reports and some other business was transacted. During this session Rev. H. D. Holmes, pastor of the State Street Methodist church, and Rev. Charles Olmstead, pastor of the Congregational church, were introduced to the conference and invited to take seats as honored guests.

In the afternoon Rev. B. Winget, who has been a member of the Free Methodist church nearly as long as it has been organized, gave a most interesting address on "Early Free Methodism."

The church was organized in 1860 and Rev. Mr. Winget joined in 1861. "The Free Methodist Church," said he, "is a result of the outpouring of the Spirit according to the Gospel. People go, when His spirit is poured out. One characteristic of the Free Methodist church is that in early days the people attended in school houses, barns, etc. They did not wait for invitation. They didn't go when wanted but when needed."

Rev. Mr. Winget told several of his experiences in the early days of Free Methodism which should stir the heart of every true believer. He said: "Stronger faith was needed by the young who went out in the work in those days than is needed now because of the difference in the condition of things.

"Every Free Methodist was characterized by simplicity—simplicity in dress, in expenditure of means and in worship."

In the evening the church was crowded with an audience which attentively listened to the address given by Rev. Patrick Morgan, a converted Monk.

RETURNED HOME TO FIND MARAUDERS HAD BEEN BUSY IN HIS ABSENCE

When Max Shapiro, a junk dealer, entered his home last night in Seward st, he found bedding, foodstuffs, kitchen utensils and different odds and ends strewn all over the house. From the appearance of the rooms it was believed at first that in intruder had entered for the purpose of robbery. In the cellar, however, Mr. Shapiro found evidence of their spite work, every can of fruit having been demolished, a crate of eggs smashed and other articles purposely broken.

Mrs. Shapiro, his wife, and five children, had gone to Syracuse Wednesday to obsreve the Jewish New Year, intending to be gone for two days. This fact was evidently known by the intruders.

The police were called into the case immediately after Mr. Shapiro's discovery, and an arrest is expected before night. The police believe a gang of boys responsible. That the miscreants might have added incendiarism to their crime is shown by the appearance of the downstairs living rooms, where excelsior had been torn from a couch, kerosene sprinkled all over and matches scattered on the floor. One bit of evidence would tend to fasten the crime on a gang of boys, as the playthings of the Shapiro children, the oldest of whom is only thirteen, were purposely destroyed. In addition to the damage in the house, a quantity of valuable metal, such as copper and brass, is missing. Entrance to the barn, in which the metal was stored, and to the house was obtained by smashing the locks on the doors.

The police made a careful investigation of the surroundings at midnight, and after their departure the owner asked a friend to remain in the house with him during the remainder of the night. About two o'clock this morning, the two men heard footsteps at the rear of the house, and Mr. Shapiro's friend, an Italian known as 'Joe," rushed from the house and ran after the prowler armed with a revolver. The unknown, however, made good his escape in a neighboring cluster of trees. The Italian was unable to see the man very plainly in the dark, but noted that he was particularly short and stocky.

The damage to the interior of the house will amount to several hundred dollars.

PARTISANSHIP A FAILURE

Sane, honest men of this city will on Sept. 17, be he Democrat or Republican, lay aside partisanship and vote for Commission Form of Government. The city, no matter how small, that is constantly passing from the control of one political party to another cannot help but pay the cost; the cost spells as a rule a depleted treasury and a hindrance to a healthy growth. Mark the result in our own city. With our depleted treasury and such a high tax rate where is the inducement to an outsider to locate here? Rentals of home and business places are exorbitant in face of the amount of business done. Building is prohibitive, and so we as a city are not allowed to grow because of our own stupidity; our waste, and our selfishness.

The idea of non-partisanship in city elections now shows signs, however, of spreading to legislative and even state elections; in fact, it has spread there. The California legislature, at the instance of Governor Johnson, has passed a law putting the whole state government, including the governor, on a non-partisan basis. Minnesota already has a law for the non-partisan election of the legislature, and there are non-partisan laws in some other cities. And isn't the logic of it as plain as the nose on a man's face? "Plums is plums" is a self-explanatory expression. Many times "plums" are dropped as a reward solely for the "efficiency" exhibited by the personage who was able to corral votes for his party. As a result the city is more than managed; it is "done." Some one pays the price. It is the taxpayer.

Every taxpayer who thinks, and whose moral purpose is straight, will be sure to vote for commission form of government on September 17.

There are many reasons why people should co-operate, and one is because of the brotherhood of man. We talk very lucidly of it before election day, but don't think very much of it at any other time. I was particularly struck by that while in the New York City Health Department. We had among our laws one hundred eighty-seven laws—all founded on one thing, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The man who loves his neighbor won't spit on the sidewalk, or let smoke come out of his chimney to get on his neighbor's clothes, or keep a dog that barks at night. You see all of this work is founded on the principle of love for your neighbor. I wonder if we could not have a little more of that real brotherhood? It is a fearful fight that people are making today against disease based on negligence, misery, sensuality—all these diseases that spring out of these things. I have unlimited hope for the future, and an abiding faith in the people.—Doctor Thomas Darlington.

The Perambulating Showcase

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

THE newspaper is a huge shop window, carried about the town and delivered regularly into thousands of homes, to be examined at the leisure of the reader. This shop window is unlike the actual plate glass showcase only in one respect—it makes display of descriptions instead of articles.

You have often been impressed by the difference between the decorations of two window-trimmers, each of whom employed the same materials for his work. The one drew your attention and held it by the grace and cleverness and art manifested in his display. The other realized so little of the possibilities in the materials placed at his disposal, that unless some one called your attention to his mediocrities you would have gone on unconscious of their existence.

An advertiser must know that he gets his results in accordance with the skill exercised in preparing his verbal displays. He must make people stop and pause. His copy has to stand out.

He must not only make a show of things that are attractive to the eye but are attractive to the people's needs, as well.

The window-trimmer must not make the mistake of thinking that the showiest stocks are the most salable. The advertiser must not make the mistake of thinking that the showiest words are the most clinching.

Windows are too few in number to be used with indiscretion. The good merchant puts those goods back of his plate glass which nine people out of ten will want, once they have seen them.

The good advertiser tells about goods which nine readers out of ten will buy, if they can be convinced.

Newspaper space itself is only the window, just as the showcase is but a frame for merchandise pictures. A window on a crowded street, in the best neighborhood, where prosperous persons pass continually, is more desirable than one in a cheap, sparsely settled, neighborhood. An advertisement in a newspaper with the most readers and the most prosperous ones, possesses a great advantage over the same copy, in a medium circulating among persons who possess less means. It would be foolish for a shop to build its windows in an alleyway—and just as much so to put its advertising into newspapers which are distributed among "alley-dwellers."

Opinions

DOLLARS VS. THE SOUL.

That the European war will strengthen our financial position is the opinion expressed by President William A. Law of the American Bankers' Association. Mr. Law foresees that we shall be "rich enough and generous enough (when the war ends) to contribute liberally toward the help of the needy."

This will be better than being rich. The value of riches is limited in the long run to the ability to assist others. As a means of indulging luxury and pleasures wealth is absolutely valueless not alone, but a clog upon spiritual development. The sooner this nation to a man realizes the fact that riches of themselves constitute a clog in the soul, the better it will be for us as a nation and individually.

Wealth means nothing, will mean nothing, in the course of the world demand now turned in our direction, unless we profit by the inevitable duty to which Mr. Law has so thoughtfully pointed. This duty will consist as follows, in his view:

To contribute liberally to help the needy.

To assist in the reconstruction of the ruined nations.

To give employment to the mass of immigrants who probably will rush to our shores.

The fourth factor in national greatness cited by Mr. Law is something in a commercial way, but it can mean nothing—less than nothing, in a moral way. "To compete vigorously with the stronger nations in seeking foreign trade" is a legitimate prospectus; it has no bearing whatever on our ultimate vindication as a nation of men and women true to their professions.

The opportunity, Mr. Law thinks, is to arrive. Opportunity will knock but once. We shall have ample room to show that philanthropy and humanity are not mere catch words on our lips, that we do not care more for dollars than we do for the noblest qualities of the heart and mind.—Auburn Adv.-Journal.

TAFT AND DIRECT PRIMARIES.

Former President Taft discussed the direct primary in his address today before the American Bankers' Association. While he admits that the convention system gave rise to abuses and that bosses and machines were able to control, yet he says the convention was a body with some responsibility and desired to name a ticket that would win. He says that under the general primary there is no such responsibility, and that especially is this true in the naming of subordinate offices. He holds that the primaries are attended by the minority of the party and that, therefore, the minority names the ticket.

It is difficult to see why Mr. Taft takes this position regarding the direct primary. His view is not that of the general public that has used it. In no state where it is employed—and today it is used in nearly every state in the Union—has there been an effort to repeal the measure. People are satisfied with the primary, for it affords them an opportunity to express themselves.

When did the majority of the party name the ticket under the old system of caucuses? It is to be feared that Mr. Taft is not familiar with the venerable caucus manipulations as carried on in the smaller cities and towns. A handful of men invariably ruled. Everybody else was asked to get out of the way when their steam rollers came puffing along by. Andthey did it, because the caucus manipulators always worked carefully and formed minutely their little schemes, all a part of the big machine, and a hard combination to encounter.

Mr. Taft is wrong when he intimates that the old convention system should be restored. The public will never stand for such action. Crude as the direct primary is in many parts of the country, it provides the vehicle for free expression and without the interference of any self-seeking aggregation of individuals who have brought party organizations into such ill repute.—Watertown Times.

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR WORKER URGED

Rochester, Sept. 11.—"Physical examination of employes without health insurance is as anomalous as diagnosis without treatment," was the very forceful declaration of Dr. John B. Andrews, Secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, yesterday afternoon at the meeting of the section on industrial hygiene at Mechanics Institute. "Without state or co-operative supervision, physical examination is an imposition upon the workman, an unjust burden upon the employer and a menace to medical practice."

"This country appears to be finally aroused on the subject of industrial safety," continued Dr. Andrews, "but it has little conception of what must be done to raise the standard of health Proof if this is found in the uncompromising opposition raised on all sides against such a salutary scheme as physical examination of employes, which is the first elementary step in industrial hygiene. Labor is opposed to such examinations. And, as the loss of a job without any compensating relief, the workman naturally resents such action.

"On the other hand, the employer may well contend that, since the gain from better health conditions is social, he should not be the only one to bear the financial burden of health supervision. The expenditure should be sosial, even though it might repay the employer in the long run to bear the expense by himself.

"Finally, the physician opposes the medical examination of employes, out of fear of contract practice; and, as long as large industrial concerns have the sode supervision of medical attendance an dfees, there is nothing to prevent them from getting their medical service by the cheapest possible means."

Dr. D. B. Armstrong, director of the Association for Improving Conditions of the Poor, New York City, touched upon the social aspects of industrial hygiene—its elevation of the worker to higher physical and mental standards of efficiency. Other speakers were Dr. I. M. Rubinow, Wallace D. Yaple and Dr. C. T. Graham-Rogers, of the State Department of Labor, who said that his department wanted to co-operate with the Department of Health as much as possible, and to carry the work to the homes of the workingman, but that it could not do it all alone. Victor C. Noonan, safety director of the Ohio Industrial Commission, told of what Ohio is doing to conserve human life in industry.

TOO MUCH OF A GOOD THING

The people of a village in Massachusetts have had a peculiar, not to say distressful, experience in the matter of automobile horns. It was decided by the selectment that a minimum limit of horn-blowing must be established in the interest of safety first. The ordinance went into effect promptly. When too late it was discovered that no maximum limit for the noise-making implements had been pro vided. Thus, after the news of the passage of the ordinance had gone forth, there were no arrests for its violation. But there was, and is, if the ordinance has not been repealed, screeching by day and revelry of hideous noises by night. No automobilist feels that he is fully complying with the law unless his honking appliance is in full blast as he pulls his car through the unfortunate village.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

BEAUTIFY DISPOSAL PLANTS AND PLACES FOR REFUGE

Rochester, Sept. 11.—"Beautify the sewage-disposal system plants of cities. Plant trees about them. To these trees will come birds to nest and sing and cavort. You need these birds. They will help you care for your fly problems."

"Such, in substance, was the plea brought to the sanitary engineers in a session at Mechanics Institute yesterday afternoon. Consulting City Engineer Edwin A. Fisher was one of the advocates of this plan, which he is carrying out in Rochester. All the engineers held that it was a good thing, both from the fact that the trees would hide the ugliness of such places and serve in the more practical way suggested."

Aberdeen, S. D., completed its first month without saloons August 1. For July, 1915, there wereb ut 40 arrests, fifteen for drunkenness, as compared with 128 arrests, 71 for drunkenness, the corresponding monthl ast year when Aberdeen had eighteen saloons.

"Rockford, Ill., gets no money from saloon licenses, yet it has spent more money than any other city in Illinois of its rank and proportionately for schools, streets and all city purposes," says a correspondent for one of the Chicago daily papers. 'It has few policemen, one to 1,800 population, while Chicago has one to 500."

The Atlanta Methodist Stewards' Association, at its last regular meeting, adopted, by unanimous vote of the hundred and twenty-eight mem bers present, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we, the Atlanta Methodist Stewards' Association, do hereby urgently request all the pastors of the Methodist churches of this district not to appoint any member to office in the church or Sunday school nor upon any church board who secretly or openly votes for or otherwise encourages and aids the liquor traffit."

Of course prohibition does not prohibit, but the Temperance Society of the Methodist church says it has received reports of notl ess than thirteen failures of breweries and distilleries within the past few months.

The production of beer has declined during the past eight months millions of barrels, and of whiskey, millions of gallons. The federal revenue from this source is falling off rapidly.

The stocks and bonds of the Distillers' Securities Corporation, the American Malting Company and similar concerns are, to say the least, not quite as lively as a chigger at a picnic.

METEOR'S DASH WAS A BRILLIANT EXPLOIT

Germans, Hemmed In, Escaped on a Norse Merchantman.

Berlin.—The story of a naval exploit which matches in daring the spectacular rovings of the Emden, the Prince Eitel and other German commerce destroyers was told when the details of the sinking of the German auxiliary Meteor were received.

After an adventurous dash in the North sea the captain of the Meteor, hemmed in by enemy patrol boats, succeeded in escaping with his crew and British prisoners aboard a commandeered merchant craft after he blew up his own vessel.

"According to private reports," says a news agency, "the Meteor, a converted merchant steamer, succeeded in breaking through the lines of British patrol ships and traveling to the Orkney islands, 550 miles from her base. She laid a large number of mines and destroyed British merchant ships.

"Finally she encountered the British cruiser Ramsey, which she sank after a splendid maneuver. The captain of the Meteor, whose crew consisted of about twenty-five men, saved and captured forty-three men from the Ramsey. About sixty others were drowned.

"British battle cruisers, notified by wireless, pursued the Meteor. After the Meteor had burned the Danish merchantman Jason, with a contraband cargo aboard, the little German craft, facing four British cruisers, stopped a Norwegian steamer, transferred the captured British contraband crew and also put the Danish sailors on board. This boat escaped from her pursuers with the captured Englishmen. The Meteor was sunk by exploding her mines."

Acts as Cushion and Prevents Fractured Skull in Auto Accident.

Philadelphia.—Thrown from her brother's automobile when it was struck by another machine, the driver of which was endeavoring to avoid hitting a child, Miss Ella Tolle, twenty years old, received severe lacerations of the scalp and probably internal injuries.

Physicians say that it was only her wealth of hair that saved her from a fractured skull. The other car was driven by Gustav Eberle of Germantown.

Rewards Faithful Horse.

Riverhead, N. Y.—Dr. George P. Griffing of Greenpoint, Brooklyn and South Jamesport, N. Y., created a trust fund of $5,000 in his will, filed for probate here, with the income from which his "faithful old horse, Frank," is to be maintained in comfort for the rest of his life.

Tilden's Dog.

At one of the early dog shows Samuel J. Tilden bought an immense Great Dane dog. "What's his name?" asked a visitor.

"Askim," said Mr. Tilden.

"What good would that do?"

"It's his name," was the reply.

So it was—Askim.

The dog knew a number of tricks, but would only perform when fed. "He'd make a good politician," said his owner as he gave him a bone.—Exchange.

HOME TOWN HELPS

PLAN FOR A GARDEN CITY

Cleveland Citizens Are Beginning to Recognize the Value of Trees and Flowered Spots.

Reminiscence and a measure of hope are combined in the suggestion of one of the women entered in the Plain Dealer vacant lot and home gardening movement. "It is a grand idea," she writes, "to get Cleveland back to what it was when I remember it first—the forest and garden city of the state."

Many memories span the same stretch of Cleveland history, and many residents are welcoming the opportunity to do their share in restoring, as far as practicable, the conditions that existed half a century ago. Much of the change wrought in this period cannot now be remedied; yet a good deal can be done in the direction indicated.

An industrial city, growing by leaps and bounds, cannot expect to retain all the sylvan beauty of its younger days. Shade trees are poisoned by elements in the atmosphere that should not have escaped the chimneys, and by poisons in the soil that should have been confined to pipes. Tillable vacant lots become fewer in number and the old-fashioned garden of roses is likely to give way to other, less picturesque devices.

Yet the city really needs this companionship of cultivated trees and gardens more than the village did, for the country moves farther afield and the more highly organized urban life becomes the greater is the need of such relaxation as home gardens afford.

The Cleveland of earlier days was a town of trees and flowers, of home plots blossoming in copious measure to match the earnestness of their owners. "To get Cleveland back to what it was—the forest and garden city of the state." Plenty of loyal residents, young and old, will second the suggestion.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

USE OF MANURE IN GARDEN

Matter of Much Moment to Those Who Desire a Luxuriant Growth of Flowers.

Nearly every owner of a garden knows that he must annually supply the garden with stable manure to keep up the physical texture and general plant food in the soil. For this nothing is better than well-rotted horse manure. But there are special crops of flowers that need special feeding to get high-class flowers. An inquiry is just at hand asking for "rush food" for carnations. The grower wishes to feed heavily at proper times in order to produce showy blossoms for early winter. Carnations have very fine hair-like roots that need equable conditions of soil, moisture, temperature, food, etc. Aside from a rich, friable soil, potash and lime are needed to keep plants in good general health, both of these are supplied in wood ashes, or one may use air-slaked lime and either sulphate or nitrate of potash. The latter also contains nitrogen. Well-rotted animal manures, especially pulverized sheep manure, make fine stems, leaves and general plant growth. If stems are weak, bone meal and lime will stiffen them and also induce the formation of flowers. Feed frequently, but in small or light doses.

Desirable Magnolias.

Chinese and Japanese magnolias are especially desirable for lawn planting. They prefer a warm, rich, dry soil, and should be planted carefully in the spring. The Yulan magnolia, M. conspicua, is known for its large white flowers, produced before the leaves. It is shrublike while young, but becomes a symmetrical tree as it attains age. Similar in habit, but blooming a little later, is Soulange's magnolia, flowers white and purple, cup shaped, three to five inches in diameter. The foliage is large and massive, and this magnolia is so hardy, vigorous and handsome that it is [illegible]emely satisfactory to plant. [illegible] bloom than either of the pre[illegible]all's Japan magnolia, which [illegible] habit, forming a bushy shru[illegible]ers are pure [illegible] is not uncommon for it to open so early in April that there may be a light snowfall while it is in bloom. These magnolias vary in price from $1 to $2, as a rule.

A Clean Town.

As the citizens so the town. If this holds true, a city is only the reflection of the people who reside therein. A clean town, then, means citizens who take pride in their own personal appearance, in the cleanliness of their homes, in the condition of their houses, in the appearance of their yards, streets, alleys, parking strips and public parks. If the external appearance of a city is neat and clean, visitors are sure to conclude that its residents are a progressive, clean-cut, active unit.—Richmond Palladium.

"COFFIN NAILS" ORDERED FOR ARMIES OF THE ALLIES.

400,000,000 Cigarettes Must Be Delivered by Sept. 1.

The allies have signed a contract with a large American manufacturing firm for 400,000,000 "coffin nails." They are not metal nails to tack up coffins with, however, but are the good old "coffin nails" of the text books on physiology, the same old "coffin nails" dear Aunt Maria warns small Billy about.

The 400,000,000 cigarettes are to be delivered to the allies on or before Sept. 1. The order will keep the factory handling it busy night and day, it is stated. In order to get the "smokes" completed on time the factory will have to turn out cigarettes at the rate of 10,000,000 a day, or about 7,000 for every minute of the day, which is "goin' some," every man who "rolls his own" will admit.

If the allies smoke the cigarettes at the rate of manufacture, a cloud of smoke forty feet high should engulf the German empire; statisticians figure out.

Four hundred million cigarettes would form a tobacco bridge covering the Bug river from bank to bank from source to mouth. The "papers" used would carpet Europe as with a white pall. If laid end to end those 400,000,000 cigarettes would stretch from Paris to Berlin and from Berlin to Paris nineteen times.

TO END COUNTERFEITING.

Prisoner Offers to Make Money Safe in Return For Liberty.

If the claims of Peter Feldkamp, now a prisoner in the Wayne county (Mich.) jail under a seventeen year sentence to Fort Leavenworth for counterfeiting, are correct, he may be the means of revolutionizing the entire issue of United States paper money.

Feldkamp wrote to Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo offering in exchange for his liberty and a job with the treasury department a chemical secret he had discovered which, according to him, will make counterfeiting impossible.

Feldkamp is a photographer and an amateur chemist of no slight attainments. While experimenting in raising one dollar bills to ten dollar ones he stumbled on his process, which since his arrest, he asserts, he has perfected.

Feldkamp's process so colors the bill that it cannot be bleached and thus halts evildoers from making even the paper. Even with the paper they would still be up against a stone wall, unable to duplicate his tint.

That the Washington authorities are taking Feldkamp's assertions seriously is shown by the fact that James Sloan, head of the treasury department at Detroit, has been instructed to interview Feldkamp.

Percentage of Boats Sunk.

Out of almost 20,000 vessels which had entered or left the port of Liverpool since the German submarine blockade began only twenty-nine were sunk by German submarines. These figures were given in a speech at Liverpool by Sir A. Norman Hill, secretary of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' association.

AVIATOR LIVES TO DESCRIBE FALL

Tells of Drop to Ground Amid Fire of Fierce Conflict.

MACHINE SMASHED BY SHOT

Few Ever Survive to Give Account of Such a Thrilling Experience—Lost Consciousness as His Aeroplane Dropped Through Clouds to a Battlefield Thousands of Feet Below.

Paris.—The following account constitutes a record of an experience out of which few come alive. It is the story told by an air man of his fall and his instinct with the terror of the air.

"Scarcely had I burst through the curtain of clouds," the aviator writes, "when I saw long tongues of flame and the lightning of explosions, while the air was full of little puffs of shrapnel. I was over a battlefield. Without thinking, in automatic fashion making the necessary maneuvers, I attempted to turn about. But immediately I saw a large enemy's biplane making straight for me. It was just as I had finished my visage and lost sight of the enemy that the irreparable happened. There was a terrific crash. The machine was hit by a shell.

"It tilted forward, pushed me from behind, and the left wing was shedding its remains to the winds. My levers slackened, the machine rocked, and in spite of my efforts with the elevator and rudder pitched forward and began to fall. The earth rose up to meet me with terrific speed, and instantly the thought of the fire after the fall took me by the throat. Anything but that! With inconceivable rapidity I cut the ignition, and leaving my levers I struggled to undo my straps. I had no time, though, as we were down already. First the screw went into a hundred splinters, and an indescribable confusion of noises and movements assailed me.

"My straps cut me cruelly, then burst, and I fell crouched amid the wreck, still with the illusion of a mad race through space. In despite of all I made desperate efforts to free myself from the tangle of cords and wires. Then I heard a voice shouting, 'Lie down, in the name of God—they are firing at you!' It was only then, to my intense astonishment, that I grasped the fact that the battle was filling the air with its tumult and that the earth was trembling with reverberation.

"Mechanically I tried to raise myself on an elbow, but at that instant on the stone that protected my head came the smack of a bullet, which went ricocheting on in the midst of a shower of sparks. My giddiness increased, and I felt that I was gradually losing consciousness; then coma. I do not know how long it lasted, but gradually consciousness came back, and the tumult of the battle seemed to fade away in the distance. A confused sound of voices reached me, and I felt that I was being dragged along by the feet. Suddenly I fell into a hole. Four or five soldiers were standing round me, looking with pity at me. A great stupor was over me and prevented me from moving or speaking.

"The voices of the men seemed to come to me from afar, but I could easily make out their sense and even notice the queer phraseology of some of the remarks, such as, 'He is well touched up.' 'He is not altogether done for, but his face is a jelly,' and so on. Then a commanding tone from some invisible person asked, 'Have you caught the air man?' 'Yes, lieutenant,' answered one, and in reply to a query as to how I was, 'We cannot see; his head is all bloody, and he does not move, but one would say that he looks at us.' 'Take him to the hiding hole.'

"The men replied that it was not possible because the enemy was pouring a curtain of fire with noxious gases so that not a field mouse could pass. To the captain's hut, then, and I was taken very carefully up and carried along the passage trench, while overhead the noise of tearing metal and roaring shells was unceasing. Suddenly my bearers threw me against the side and slipped into the corners just as a tremendous report burst over our heads, followed by a shower of sliding earth and stones. The force of the shock seemed to banish my torpor and set me on my feet, to the intense astonishment of my bearers, who then led me the rest of the way till I was in the presence of the captain, a grizzled fellow, smoking a pipe, leaning against the sand bags, with his kepi tied with a handkerchief under his chin—a peaceful and jovial looking figure.

"He was extraordinarily calm and held out his hand with a kind smile and the remark, 'You had a devil of a tumble; I thought you were done for.' Just at this moment a great German biplane in distress came sliding toward us in an oblique fall. The captain immediately gave the order to fire, and from all sides rang out a fusillade from invisible soldiers. The machine came to ground like a thunderbolt, passing a few yards above our heads. There were three men on board, two of whom were dead, lying over the edge, and the pilot was stolidly maneuvering in desperation to fall within his own lines."

LEANS FROM CAR; SAVES GIRL.

Motorman Effects Heroic Rescue of Child Walking Between Tracks.

New York.—The presence of mind and courage of James Lavelle, a motorman on one of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Bath Beach trains, saved the life of an unidentified little girl, four years old, who mistook the space between the rails of the West End line for a promenade and left the sidewalk to walk there.

Lavelle was taking his train from Coney Island, loaded with women and children, when near Forty-first street, on New Utrecht avenue, he saw the child about forty feet ahead. The trains at this spot run on the surface of the street. Lavelle blew his whistle, but the child apparently did not hear. He jammed on the emergency brakes and then, realizing that he could not stop in time, ran to the front platform and, reaching forward, caught hold of the little girl. He dropped her to one side. She escaped with only a few slight bruises.

LETTERS CLOG POSTOFFICE.

Lonely Girl Who Wrote Egg Message Fails to Call For 200 Proposals.

Stroudsburg, Pa.—Unless Sadie S. Smith, the lonely girl, calls for the 200 or more letters awaiting her at the Stroudsburg postoffice Postmaster John M. Decker will make application for enlargement of this office.

Sadie is the girl who wrote a message on an egg stating that she was lonely on the farm and then placed it with the other eggs which were being prepared for shipment. This particular egg fell into the hands of Guy Hanby, a clerk in a grocery store at Wilmington, Del., and immediately Guy's heart yearned for lonely Sadie. So did the hearts of others, else there would not now be 200 letters waiting for her at the local office.

A local paper has started the search for Sadie, the Monroe county lonely farm girl. The paper says: "Have a heart, Sadie. Never start anything you can't finish. Get your letters, but have a care about that nice fellow. He may not be near as nice as some young man in your own neighborhood who will make you happier and more contented than life without friends in a great city. Ponder well, Sadie, before you leap."

CITIZENS, THINK!

USE YOUR HEADS!!

Commission-Manager Form of Government is in Force in Many Cities of the United States.

The Citizens of Those Cities Have Never Expressed a Desire to go Back to the Old Form of Government Such as Fulton Now Has.

Why Are They Satisfied?

Because—Under Commission-Manager Form of Government They Get

100 CENTS FOR EVERY DOLLAR

Why Don't They Want to Change Back?

BECAUSE under the Old Form High Taxes Have Resulted From Waste of Taxpayers' Money.

Here's an example of Poor Business Right Here in Fulton—a certificate of indebtedness for over $6,000 was given to the contractor on the Erie st. school. This certificate became past due in the hands of a foreign bank. The payment had not been provided for and the holder prepared to sue the city. The certificate was taken over by local banks to protect the city from suit on a defaulted obligation which would have seriously injured the city's credit and make bond sale difficult.

Such loose Business Methods on the part of a City Manager would not be Tolerated for an instant by the Commission Hiring Him With Power to FIRE HIM at any time.

Vote for Commission-Manager Form of Government

WOMEN ASSAILED BY SMALL BOY

She Alleges He Threw Stones, Rumpus the Result of Theft of a Bicycle by Mike Borak.

Mike Borak, the Russian lad who stole a wheel belonging to an employe of the Peters' Chocolate Works yesterday morning and hid it in the woods near Stop 28, was arraigned this morning in City Court before Judge Wilson.

Sophie Oboda, of Riverside ave., swore out a warrant in City Court this morning for the arrest of Annie Gadala and her son, John, of 117 W. First st., charging them with assault.

From the story of the Polish interpreter in the court room this morning it appears that Mrs. Gadala and Mrs. Oboda's parents were in the habit of getting into frequent rows which often ended in a free-for-all. The Gadala clan usually came out victorious, but recently the Oboda forces were too strong and Mrs. Gadala was compelled to retreat.

When Mrs. Oboda walked past the Gadala domicile yesterday she claims Mrs. Gadala told her boy to throw the stones forthwith. His aim was like unto that of young David of the Scriptures, and Mrs. Oboda was severely bruised and cut.

Mrs. Gadala and her progeny will be allowed to tell their version of the affair on Monday morning, when the case will come to trial.

MOONLIGHT GIRLS TAKE RIVER TRIP ON BOAT

Twenty young ladies from Phoenix enjoyed a moonlight trip last night on the boat "City of Fulton," which makes daily trips between Fulton and Syracuse. The party attracted much attention by their holiday spirit, especially coming through the locks at the upper bridge. After spending a short time in the downtown section sightseeing the party returned to Phoenix by trolley.

"The City of Fulton," which is engaged in carrying freight and passengers between Fulton and Syracuse, will be operated until navigation closes on the canal, about two months in the future. The boat, a couple of weeks ago was given an overhauling and is now making its scheduled trips regularly.

HOPE FOR AGREEMENT.

United Mine Workers Not Preparing For a Strike Next Spring.

President John P. White of the United Mine Workers of America recently gave out a statement in which he declared that the miners of the anthracite fields were not preparing for a strike at the expiration of the present agreement. His statement follows:

Articles appearing in certain newspapers during the last few days, for the most part published a great distance from the anthracite industry, containing the information that the anthracite mine workers are making huge preparations for a big strike at the expiration of the present agreement, March 21, 1916, are absolutely unfounded.

The campaign now being conducted in the anthracite region is for the sole purpose of uniting the men of the mines as members of the United Mine Workers of America. When the anthracite miners have perfected their organization I am of the belief that the union will be sufficiently strong and efficient to command the respect and recognition it deserves.

I have every reason to feel assured that the operators, like the miners, want to be fair, and consequently I am at a loss to understand why the attempt in some quarters is being made to misrepresent the real purpose of our present membership campaign.

The international officials nor district officials have formulated any plans that contemplate a strike at the expiration of the agreement. We are, on the other hand, hopeful that we will enjoy the opportunity to meet the operators in conference and reach a fair agreement, embracing needed reforms and betterments that we feel quite confident the general condition of the industry will permit. The public should not become alarmed at the stories of a strike nature, for the mission of the United Mine Workers is one of peace, and I predict that such will be the outcome of our negotiations when we meet the operators.

WEAVERS GET RAISE.

Seven Thousand Carpet Workers Receive a 10 Per Cent Boost.

The 7,000 employees in the mills of the Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet company at Yonkers, N. Y., were agreeably surprised when they received their pay envelopes on July 29 to find in them slips announcing a 10 per cent increase in wages. The increase aggregates $8,000 a week and brings the company's weekly payroll up to about $90,000. The mills have been running only four days a week for some time, but it is expected that full time operation will soon be resumed.

The increase is said to have been ordered by Alexander Smith Cochran, well known in yachting circles, who is the controlling director. He has been participating more actively in the affairs of the company of late. The increase restores a wage scale which existed up to two years ago, when it was announced that general business conditions necessitated a cut.

Part time operation of the mills had been caused to some extent by inability to get enough dyestuffs after the foreign supply was shut off by the war. This situation has been largely remedied.

Du Pont Increases Wages.

Employees of the Brandywine (Del.) shops of the Du Pont Powder company were notified that from Aug. 1 eight hours would constitute a day's work and that the workmen would receive ten hours' pay for the shorter day. Eleven hundred men were affected by the new order. They include every class of workman, from the skilled mechanic to the laborers. The eight hour day was granted voluntarily and without any request from the workmen. At the Brandywine shops machinery and equipment for the company's powder plants are manufactured.

Copper Men Get Bonus.

The Wolverene and Mohawk Copper Mining companies, Calumet, Mich., in paying their 1,200 employees on July 31 included an extra check for 5 per cent of the total wages of June as a bonus because of the high price at which copper is selling. It came as a surprise to the men. It was unofficially announced that the two companies might continue to pay the same bonus every month while copper remains at 20 cents a pound or better. It was said that several other mining companies will follow this example.

More Pay For Rural Teachers.

The Wisconsin state legislature has passed a bill increasing wages of rural schoolteachers $5 to $25 a month, according to qualifications and terms of service. There are about 7,000 rural teachers in the state.

OF INTEREST TO LABOR.

Trade unionism is the one protection in which the workers can put their trust.

The Danbury hatters have been served with foreclosure writs on their property.

Trade unionism has been the great revolutionizing force for industrial betterment and progress.

More than 200,000 machinists have received the eight hour day with advanced or no reduction of wages.

D. G. G. Whitaker, health officer, has just returned from the state and national convention of health officers at Rochester. Both conventions were held at the same time this year, and the doctor reports some interesting work. Among the prominent lecturers was M. Governor Charles S. Whitman also addressed the convention.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 11.—What the leaders of the Constitutional Convention believe to be one of the most vitally important amendments to the Constitution is that amendment relative to home rule for cities. The proposition was debated at length and had numerous enemies and yet many advocates.

The proposition amends Article 12 of the Constitution generally in relation to cities and villages and their powers of self-government.

In part the amendment reads: "Every city shall have exclusive power to manage, regulate and control its property, affairs and municipal government, subject to the provisions of this constitution and subject further to the provisions of the general laws of the state, of laws applying to all the cities of the state without classification or distinction, and of laws applying to a county not wholly included within a city establishing or affecting the relation between such a county and city therein."

The proposed amendment confers the following powers upon cities: Authority to organize and manage all departments and bureaus and to regulate the duties and qualifications for city officers and to prescribe the length of terms; authority to enact amendments through its legislative body, subject to the approval of the mayor and the board of estimate and apportionment. Amendments which change the framework of the government of the city or modifies restrictions as to the issuing of bonds or contracting debts, however, are to be submitted to the legislature in 1916 on or before May, 16th of March and in any year following during the first week of its next regular session, and shall take effect as laws sixty days after such submission unless in the meantime the legislature shall disapprove the same by joint resolution. Every other amendment shall take effect upon its enactment as above provided without submission to the legislature.

Before it shall take action upon any amendment, the legislature must provide for a public notice and opportunity for a public hearing by the legislative body of the city desiring such amendment.

Another provision of the proposed amendment and one which is vital, specifies that at the general election of 1917, every city, with the exception of those which have charters after one revision shall otherwise provide otherwise, shall submit to the electors the question of whether there shall be a commission to revise the charter of the city. Cities at the same time may choose seven commissioners to revise the city charter in case the question be answered in the affirmative

In the City of New York the number of commissioners is to be sixteen.

The method of filing the revision is dealt with at length. If the revision is approved by the majority of the electors of a city, it shall be submitted to the legislature during the first week in January of the year following its approval and if not disapproved by that body shall take effect.

Under the proposed amendment the legislature is authorized to delegate to cities such of its powers of legislation as to matters of state concern as it yma deem expedient. The legislature is prohibited from passing laws relative to the property, affairs or municipal government of any city excepting such as is applicable to all cities of the state without classification or distinction. There are other provisions.

American Perfect Process for Making Hosiery Dyes

New York, Sept. 11.—One of the serious dyestuffs problems is in a fair way of being settled, according to Dr. Thomas H. Norton, investigator for the United States Government, who said yesterday that sulphur blacks, the lack of which is tying up the hosiery mills of the country, soon would be manufactured here.

According to Dr. Norton, three men called at his offices in the Customs House and said a $500,000 company is being formed for them anufacture of these dyes.

Because the imported dyes used for hosiery practically are exhausted in this country mills are preparing to close throughout the United States. Dr. Norton said he is convinced the assurances given by his callers were bona fide and that there soon would be on the market dyestuffs made under the sulphurp rocesses in sufficient quantities to meet practically all needs.

The serious condition of the trade was brought to the attention of Mr. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, yesterday, according to Dr. Norton, who said W. R. Corwine, Secretary of the National Aossociation of Clotheirs called upon the secretary at the Belmont Hotel and, told him lack of dyestuffs was creating a serious situation for the clothiers of the entire country.

Dr. Norton said several financiers in Wall street are waiting only for actual tests to determine the value of various methods discovered before advancing all the capital necessary to make the country independent of foreign makesr of dyestuffs. He also said he hoped to call on Thomas A. Edison within a short time and tell him how necessary it is for the inventor to continue his manufacture of anilline oil, a basic for anilline dyes, which he understands will be stopped when peace is declared.

"That would be a direct loss to the country," said Dr. Norton. "Mr. Edison's work and that of the DuPoints, who have constructed a $1,500,000 plant within two months, is a monument to the energy of the United States. We want this same energy to continue and develop the coal tar lye work."

BEEN MARRIED FOR 25 YEARS

In honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Parsons of South First st. entertained last evening with a dance and dinner at their home. Several of the more intimate friends of the family and out of town guests were present at the dinner, but invitations for 150 were extended for the dance, which was held on the third floor of the house.

Mrs. Parsons, assisted by Mrs. E. A. Bond of Albany, received the guests. The house was beautifully decorated with pink and white as the prevailing color scheme, and in the center of the ball room a large Jananese parasol was hung from which were suspended many colored lights. Several electric fans aided to the comfort of the dancers, and music was furnished by the Elks' Imperial orchestra. Novel and dainty refreshments were served at midnight.

Mr. and Mrs. Parsons received many btautiful gifts and the congratulations of all present as well as several messages from friends in different parts of the country who were unable to attend. Mrs. Parsons wore her wedding dress at the dance, and its resemblance to the prevailing modes, which hark back to the fashions of the last century, was remarked.

Almost every local family prominenet socially was represented and among the guests from other cities were Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Bond and Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Jewett of Albany.

MR. AND MRS. PARSONS OBSERVED ANNIVERSARY

(Contributed.)

One of the pleasant events of the season occurred at the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Parsons Friday evening, when about 150 guests met to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the wedding of their host and hostess. Mrs. Parsons in her wedding dress scarcely looked like a bride of so long ago, as she so happily made welcome her many guests. It a few gray hairs on the head of the host spoke of passing years, his fact could not have been pleasanter nor his smile more genial twenty-five years ago. The home was beautifully decorated in colors pink and white; with a profusion of flowers in parlors and dining rooms; some of which were sent by friends who could not be present, notably a bouquet of beautiful roses from Mrs. Platt of New York, where each of the twenty-five years was remembered. The third story for many of the company seemed the most attractive place. Festooned with long ribbons of pink and white, with its many electric bulbs and smoothly polished floor, it was an ideal place for dancing to the music given by the orchestra of five pieces.

Among the out of town guests were Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Bond and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Jewett of Albany, and Mr. and Mrs. B. S. Stanley of Casenovia.

CADY ABLE TO LAND AT WILL ON CROSS

"Spot" Cady, the Phoenix boy, last night removed all doubt as to whether he was better than "Young" Leach Cross when he handed his opponent the K. O. in the third round of a scheuled four-round bout at the Syracuse arena. Cady, who is not as clever a boxer as Cross, troe in from the bell and gave his opponent no time to set up a scientific defense. Two weeks ago when the same two boys fought, the referee was obliged to call off the bout, Cross claiming a foul. At that time there was doubt as to whether Cross did not seek this way out of the affair to escape further punishment.

In the main go "Young" Fisher earned a shade decision over Jerry Biegel in six rounds. In fiove other bouts, the boys were evenly matched and all finished about even.

WHY THE HOME PAPER ? ? ?

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $20,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

self up into quite an advanced condition of pareutal fury. "Let him marry a typewriter? (Don't let that hurt your feelings, my dear.) Let some designing woman get her hands on him for a rich man's son? (Business of indignation, my dear.) I'll turn him down and out in proper fashion. Upon my word I feel like doing it this minute."

"But there's one chance you've overlooked, Mr. Martin," resumed Mary, pursing her pretty mouth slightly at the corners.

"What's that?"

"That he may not propose to me again—I mean at all," she corrected.

"Well, then, I'll disinherit him for sure," roared the soap king. "Now, be off with you, too, before I lose my temper."

But as Mary turned to go he called after her again (what a flat, pretty back she had, he thought, subconsciously, as he watched her lay her hand on the doorknob):

"No, don't go yet. There's one thing more. We must make a bona fide deal

"Rodney, why don't you do something worth while?"

of this thing. You want to hear my terms, of course, don't you?"

"Your terms?"

"Yes, terms, and here they are. You needn't expect anything better. I'll pay you $2,500 down if you turn the trick. Twenty-five hundred dollars! You could use it, I suppose, couldn't you?"

At these "terms" Mary turned all the way round and leaned her pretty back against the dark mahogany door, her figure in its gray dress prettily outlined against it and her hand still clinging to the cut glass knob. Twenty-five hundred dollars from Mr. Martin! Her face and eyes, if not her lips, repeated the fat and racy words. But could she? fluttered from her pretty eyes. And yet she would, said the set mouth and chin. But no, she couldn't, said her shell-like ears, blushing as pink as coral. But yes; why not, said the firm mouth at last, and Mr. Cyrus Martin, watching this delicate byplay across her lovely features, that found more favor in his sight than ever this minute, despite his gruff demeanor, knew that the fates were playing on his side.

"Very well, Mr. Martin," said Mary Grayson finally. "It's a bargain then."

"A bargain," said old Cyrus, chuckling inwardly, and rubbing his hands together like an old fashioned actor doing the part of Shylock. "Come here, and I'll give you my blessing."

He stooped and kissed her respectfully on her white forehead and could not resist the temptation to let his hand linger a moment on the firm roundness of her upper arm and shoulder before he released her. "A bargain," he resumed, with suddenly returning gruffness. "So now go to it."

Rodney Martin himself, as luck would have it, opened the front door with his pass key and came in just as Mary was descending into the lower hall from his father's library.

"Mary," he exclaimed delightedly, "you here? What in thunder's the matter with Johnson?"

"One question at a time, please," said Mary, collecting herself as rapidly as possible. "What's Johnson got to do with it?"

"Why, I left my telephone numbers with him," explained Rodney, "so he could call me up the very moment you came in."

"You sound like a doctor going to the theater," said Mary.

"Same principle," echoed Rodney; "S O S, C Q D and all the rest of it. Safety first, you know."

Mary parried and fenced as best she could. This was going to be a somewhat earlier opportunity of putting through their scheme than she had bargained for with the old magnate upstairs. Rodney showed only too plainly that he had something on his mind. He drew her into a small reception room on the first floor and made her sit down. It was a little pink and gold room which was never used except for a cloakroom when dinners were given or the housekeeper engaged a new servant. Lately Mary's typewriting machine had come to figure incongruously as a part of its furnishings since the clicking keys bothered Mr. Martin in his library and Mary came down here often to write.

Despite her bargain with the old gentleman upstairs she made a brave attempt to ward off something that she saw was inevitable here and now. She took the lines in her own hands and tried to steer the conversational craft safely through the rapids.

"Rodney," she said, "tell me what you have been doing today."

He told her.

"Well, I call that a very unprofitable twelve hours," said Mary firmly. "Rodney, why don't you do something worth while? Why don't you go into some business? Have an office with your name on the door. Be somebody. It would please your father so."

Rodney was dressed in the correctest masculine fashion, Mary noted—gray spats, a braided English morning coat, a huge white carnation in his buttonhole, and quite heavenly trousers. He wore a tie from Dasher's. Rodney was a nice boy, and had nice manners. He was only twenty-four, and his face had a certain quaint, frank charm in spite of his funny little mustache. He was by no means brainless, Mary was sure, notwithstanding his father's theories; only undeveloped by reason of the kind of life he had led and its appallingly frictionless conditions.

At the present moment he had an unaccustomed air of resolution that pervaded all the little room and made Mary retreat behind the typewriting desk, quailing in spite of herself. As she sat down, to her astonishment, she beheld Rodney turning the key in the door that led into the hall.

CHAPTER III.

Complications.

"I WANT to talk to you," said Rodney, coming toward Mary. "I've been wanting this opportunity for days, and now that I've got it I don't propose to be interrupted. That's why I locked the door."

Rodney had come over to her.

"I want to talk to you," he said impetuously. "Mary, will you marry me?"

"Why, really," began Mary shyly.

"I don't know what to say," hesitated the girl, feeling her ground.

"Say yes," cried Rodney, waiting feverishly to hear her answer.

It came at last shyly, "Yes," whereupon Rodney cried, "You angel!" joyfully and tried to grab her. But things must not go quite so fast, Mary thought intuitively, and drew away a little from him, though, to tell the truth, she would willingly have let him catch her as she felt now.

"No, no; wait a moment," she said.

"We'll be married right away," went on Rodney unabashed.

"But suppose your father disapproves?" said Mary.

"He won't know anything about it until we're married, and then what could he do?" objected Rodney.

"He might cut you off," suggested Mary sagely.

"Would you care?" asked Rodney.

"I? No, no, indeed," said Mary hastily. "I was thinking of you, dear."

"Don't you bother about me," cried Rodney. "We'll be married tomorrow and then come home for the parental blessing."

"No. I couldn't do that," said Mary. "It wouldn't be right. I'm his private secretary. He trusts me and brings me here to his home, and then to find I'd married his son on the sly—no, Rodney, we couldn't do that."

"You do make it sound rather bad," said Rodney. "I shouldn't want to treat father badly. We've always been pretty good friends, he and I. I guess I'd better tell him—in a week or so"—

Mary's self composure had been rapidly returning during this colloquy, and she was surer of what she wanted. Indeed it piqued her a little that Rodney should have made such a proposal ... so that now her own inclina... the old gentleman's upstairs ... same channel. She spoke ...solutely:

"Why, Rodney, if you love me you will want to get this awful suspense over with."

"But suppose he does object?" Rodney argued, seeing his light of happiness grow dim.

"Even then I wouldn't give you up," said his sweetheart.

"Mary!"

"You could go into business," she went on, "make a big man of yourself, make me proud of you"—

"You talk just like the heroine in a play I saw last night," protested Rodney. "She wanted the hero to go to work, and he did, and then for four acts everybody suffered."

"Don't you want to work?" asked Mary anxiously.

"I should say not," Rodney answered quite seriously. "Imagine going to bed every night knowing you'd got to get up in the morning and go to business."

"You'd be happier, wouldn't you," queried Mary, "if you had a job?"

"Please don't talk like father," protested Rodney. "He's preached a job at me ever since I left college. Why should I work? Father made millions out of soap and is forever complaining that he's always had his nose to the grindstone, that he's never known what fun was, that it's all made him old before his time. I can't see the sense of following an example like that—I really can't. He's got enough for you and me and our children and their grandchildren. I've explained all this to him, but I can't seem to make him understand. But it's simple—why work when there's millions in the family? And why even talk of it when you and I are in love?"

He leaned hungrily toward her, stretching out his arms to her, and finished on a note of genuine appeal: "Come, kiss me, Mary."

But Mary drew back from him quickly. "No, you mustn't," she said firmly. "Not till you've spoken to your father."

"You won't even kiss me till I tell him?"

"No."

"And you will when I do?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll tell him right away!" cried the valiant lover, striding to the door.

"Oh, Rodney, you're splendid!" applauded Mary, "and don't be afraid."

"Afraid!" echoed Rodney scornfully. But he paused a moment at the door and said:

"You don't think I'd better wait till the morning?"

"No, I don't," said Mary. "And don't be silly about his gout. He really is a very patient invalid."

Rodney stood a moment with his hand on the knob, plucking up resolution. As he lingered there a violent knocking sounded on the other side, and his father's voice could be distinctly heard crying "Ouch!" in an extra loud tone in the hall.

"You angel!"

"Speaking of the patient invalid," whispered Rodney, looking back at the girl for whom he was so greatly daring.

"If you don't ask him now I'll never marry you," whispered Mary, forming her words as distinctly as was possible under the circumstances.

"Open the door!" cried the elder Martin angrily in the hall.

"I'm coming, father. Coming," quaked Rodney as he turned the key.

The door was no sooner opened than his father strode into the room sternly, uttering the ejaculation "Ouch!" twice and the polite phrase "the devil!" at least once as he crossed the threshold.

"W... ...hat door locked?" he deman... ...ing.

"W... ...ked?" asked Rodney in-noce...

KITCHEN CUPBOARD

CORN IN MANY GUISES.

CORN on the cob is the best kind of corn unless you find it unpleasant to eat. Surely the flavor of corn on the cob cannot be equaled by the flavor of corn prepared in any other way. But corn on the cob becomes monotonous just as any other delicacy constantly served in the same way does. Therefore it is a wise cook who has at her fingers' tips some other interesting methods of sending corn to the table.

There are methods of heating up cold corn, and, indeed, almost any made corn dish is as good made of cold corn not more than a day old. Succotash, to be at its best, should always be made of raw corn, although a good substitute can be made from boiled corn cut from the cobs, mixed with cooked lima beans and heated with a little milk or cream, butter, pepper and salt.

An easily prepared dainty made of leftover corn is corn fritters. Cut the corn from the cob. Never cut clear to the cob, but cut off part of each kernel. Then with the back of a silver knife rub the cob lengthwise to extract the rest of the kernels. To two cupfuls of corn add a cupful of milk, pepper and salt to taste, a tablespoonful and a half of flour and two beaten eggs. Fry brown, dropping the batter from a tablespoon. A delicious way to serve corn fritters for luncheon is to cook bacon until it is crisp in a big frying pan, then remove it to a hot platter and cook the fritters in the hot bacon fat.

Corn soup is another dish to make of leftover corn. Cut the kernels from the cobs and run them through a vegetable cutter two or three times. Then press through a vegetable press and then simmer gently with a slice of onion, a sprig of parsley and a pint of water—for two cupfuls of corn—for twenty or thirty minutes. Then add two cupfuls of milk and thicken with two tablespoonfuls of butter. Season with salt and pepper to taste. This soup should be served very hot.

For corn pudding cut corn enough to measure three cupfuls and mix it with four well beaten eggs, a teaspoonful of salt, a tablespoonful of sugar and a tablespoonful of flour rubbed smooth, with a tablespoonful of butter. Then add two cupfuls of milk and bake. The eggs can be beaten separately and the whites added last if desired, and the sugar may be omitted to taste.

SHARPENING A PENCIL.

The Way a Child Does It Is an Index to Its Character.

It is very often the little things that children do which give the best indication of what their future characters will be. Schoolteachers, for instance, have a first rate opportunity for watching the different traits in the children who come before them. In their work and in their play the sort of man or woman the child will become is daily unfolded. In such a small matter even as the sharpening of a pencil valuable hints may be obtained by any one in the least observant. Here it may easily be discovered whether a boy or girl is careful, destructive, wasteful or economical.

The boy, for instance, who sharpens his pencil into a stub is inclined to be economical, careful and quick in after life. The boy or girl who takes an inordinately long time to make a slender point, cutting very precisely and regularly all the time will usually prove to be of an artistic and dreamy disposition. The child who, regardless of the look of the pencil, gouges out great pieces in order to get to the lead will show impulsiveness and generosity.

Mere destructiveness, however, becomes apparent when a child takes a delight in sticking his knife in his pencil and splitting it or destroying it in some other way.

Parents, watch your children when sharpening their pencils, and correct and advise them accordingly.—Pearson's Weekly.

CARLYLE'S FIRST LOVE.

She May Have Been the Blumine of "Sartor Resartus."

During the year 1818 Thomas Carlyle, the Scotch philosopher, was living at Kirkcaldy, and he seems then for the first time to have fallen in love. The lady appears not to have returned the attachment, although she, with great insight, at the age of twenty-two, perceived the genius of her suitor of twenty-five.

In the letter in which she took leave of her admirer she used these significant expressions: "Cultivate the milder dispositions of your heart, subdue the more extravagant visions of the brain. * * * Genius will render you great. May virtue render you beloved! 'Let your light shine before men,' and think them not unworthy this trouble."

Many years after, when Carlyle wrote his reminiscences, he described the episode. He says that Margaret Gordon "continued for, perhaps, some three years a figure hanging more or less in my fancy, on the usual romantic and latterly quite elegiac and silent terms."

The real interest of the story is: Was Margaret Gordon the original of the Blumine of "Sartor Resartus?" One critic would have us answer that, although Jane Welsh might have inspired some of the details, it was Margaret Gordon who was the true original.—New York Telegram.

The Faust Legend.

For 1,400 years the Faust legend—the sale of a human soul to a devil—has existed. The first recorded hint of its vitality is given in the sixth century story of "Theophilus." That story suited the early Christians in their efforts to stamp out the necromancing devices of evilly disposed persons prone to seek power by unholy means. The association of the name of Faust, however, with the legend is not more than 400 years old. The likeliest prototype of the modern Faust is the man of the same name who in Cracow boldly proclaimed himself a professor of magic. In the sixteenth century stories Helen of Troy was bestowed by Mephistopheles upon Faust, and not until the middle of the eighteenth century does there appear a shadowy Margaret in the form of a "beautiful but poor girl," who afterward develops into the Margaret of Goethe.

The Dead Horse.

The smart traveling man stood on a corner in the little country village at dusk. He was looking for amusement, and the first object that attracted his attention was an overgrown boy, perhaps fifteen years of age, riding a horse that might have come out of the ark.

"Hello, sonny!" shouted the salesman. "How long has that horse been dead?"

Quick as a flash the boy replied, "Three days, but you're the first buzzard that has noticed it."

The traveling man moved on to the hotel.—Youth's Companion.

Force of Association.

While the owner of the touring car dismounted during necessary repairs, the young front wheel timidly asked the old back wheel:

"Don't you get weary of the social whirl—revolving and revolving and revolving?"

"You'll get used to it," said the old wheel. "Our owner is a spinster, with nothing to do but go round, till sometimes I feel like a Daughter of the Revolution myself."—Judge.

His View.

Willie—Do you think a man should be allowed to hold the highest honor in the United States more than four years? Gillis—Sure thing. I say, if a man can top the league in batting for ten or even fifteen years let him stay in the game for the good of the sport.—Boston Journal.

A Difficulty.

"When I marry the woman I want must be the possessor of brains."

"But suppose she makes the same requirement?"—Baltimore American.

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review

SEMI-FITTED LINES VERY PROMINENT.

Princess lines are gained for this frock by the introduction of front and back panels in long, unbroken lines, with a belt suggestion over the hips.

Since it has been decreed that the princess is to be one of the prevailing modes of Autumn, designers of smart clothes are busy adapting it to the needs of women whose figures require a modification of the style; hence the idea of having front and back panels in long, unbroken lines, with a belt suggestion over the hips will prove both practical and chic.

The dress shown here is in Morocco brown ratine, trimmed with brown silk soutache and a vest of white silk, finished with a flare collar. Five and three-quarter yards of 36-inch material, with ½ yard silk for the vest, are required for the design.

To put the dress together the home dressmaker begins by forming a tuck in the side front by creasing along line of slot perforations and stitching, as indicated. After the tucks are tacked in place close under-arm seams and gather lower edge of waist; add the stay, leaving free from notch and large "O" perforation to center-front and center-back.

The side gore is pleated, following the method of tucking the front, after which the upper edge is gathered and sewn to lower edge of side-front and side-back over stay, front and back edges even, and small "o" perforation in side gore at under-arm seam. Next, turn under edges of front and back on slot perforations, lap on side-front, side-back and side gore to lines of single small "o" perforations, notches even; stitch ⅜ inch from folded edges and press, leaving edges to left of center-front free above single large "O" perforation in front gore for placket. Close shoulder seam as notched. Sew standing collar to neck edge as notched. Face pointed collar and sew to neck edge, center-backs and single large "O" perforations even.

Adjust the belt to position.

Pleat side edge of sleeve, bringing "T" to corresponding small "o" perforations and tack. Close seam as notched. Sew cuff to long sleeve. Sew sleeve in armhole as notched.

For street wear the most successful colors are the very dark ones. Sharing favor with the browns and blues are dark shades of green and purple.

Woman's World

A Titled Beauty Who Also is Interested in Charities and the War.

THE COUNTESS OF WARWICK.

The Countess of Warwick, famous though she is for her beauty, has achieved quite as much distinction on account of her various and well directed charities, upon which subject she is as reticent as she is liberal. Two of the objects upon which her philanthropic energies are expended have assumed such proportions as to be beyond the power of concealment. These are the Easton School of Needlework and the Essex Needlework guild, both excellent organizations to aid the poor of England. The countess recently caused much talk by her criticisms of the social "butterflies" who make a pretense of nursing wounded soldiers—in reality posing and hindering the war work.

The countess is an optimist, as witness what she said in an interview not so very long ago.

"The best time of life is always after the age of thirty. Better than that is after forty. The very best time of life is fifty-three, which is my age. I just now am having the best time I ever had. At eighteen I was a pessimist. Now I know better. And because of what I've learned—by putting my experiences, my knowledge, to the best uses—I, like all women of my age, know better how to enjoy the days that are given to me."

This is what she thinks about the ballot for women: "The ballot in itself means nothing. What prompts the fight for the ballot in England and America is a fight for sex independence, a fight women are making—and which eventually they will win—because woman, given economic independence plus the ballot, will then be started on the road toward her right to exact a recognition of the fact that she is entitled to exercise her God given impulses quite as much as a man is."

The responsibility of the United States in the present war in Europe she voices thus:

"It seems to me that the greatest republic of the world has a serious duty, a grave responsibility. It has thriven on a gigantic scale without patronage or privileged classes, without titles, without such honors as are merely honors in name. Freed by the Atlantic from the domination of Europe, it has grown in power and given its citizens a life removed from the worst anxieties that beset the continent. It knows what kingship and unlimited power have cost Europe, and it embraces within its wide domain the children of every European nation, who dwell side by side in peace and amity. The freedom enjoyed by the republic would not be bartered for the wealth of the world, for that freedom is the secret of its eternal youth, its boundless energy, its untrammeled progress."

FURNITURE COVERS.

It is especially necessary to have looseness in a slip cover. There must be plenty of "give" to it. Otherwise when one sits on it it is apt to burst open, which would be most disconcerting, particularly if it happened to be some one else's chair.

The strip which runs from the extreme top of the chair back down to the seat, across the seat and on down to the required length, should be cut lengthwise of the goods without piecing.

Before cutting it should be tucked well into the crease between the seat and the back. The narrow fronts of the arms are cut separately.

The arm's inner side is cut lengthwise and extends over the roll, under which another seam occurs. The outside of the arm is cut in one with the side of the seat.

The rear side of the chair back is cut in two lengthwise pieces, with the opening up the middle. The back's "thickness" will also need a small piece, extending to the arm.

The fasteners are balls and sockets, or buttons and buttonholes, or, in some instances, little bows. The balls and sockets are used for the back openings or for little tabs when seam openings are used.

SMART STYLE POINTS

Fashionable Materials—Colors—Embroideries—Poise and Silhouette.

New York, Sep. 11.—Familiar faces are seen everywhere at hotel lunches, and tea rooms, and orders for fall outfits are considerably in advance of former seasons. No doubt interest in clothes has been whetted by the many Fashion Fetes that have been a notable feature of summer doings. Beginning with the artistic function at Mrs. Herman Oelrich's beautiful place at Newport, these have followed at the various resorts, and everywhere with the same result of ample receipts and great interest.

FASHIONABLE MATERIALS

There is nothing to hint at economy in the wonderful display of the season's fabrics whether in model garments, or as shown at the counters of the Fifth avenue shops. Soft velours in various weaves from "kitten's ear" to the various glove skin cloths that resemble suede, are to rival cotton velvets for the more orante suits and coats, while for more practical wear the whipcords, and a new combination of whipcord and gabardine weaving called "gabacord" are endorsed by the best tailors. Vicuna cloth in new indefinite checks and plaids, as well as in the Chestnut cross bars that are increasingly favored make motor coats and smart cross country suits. The

Tipperary tweeds are other materials especially good looking for smart rough wear.

DULL RICH COLORS

Dull rich colors are the rule, with prunes and dark Garabaldi and Bordeaux reds as the novelty note, while for contrast a dash of the brilliant pea-green in the Italian flag, brightens many an otherwise sombre frock. Fancy taffetas in stripes and plaids, many of them combined with velvet in the stripes of figures, are discreetly used for trimmings and in combinations withp lain toned woolen cloths. Such materials are especially successful in bringing a gown upt-o-date, and a little of the costly stuff goes a long way in effectiveness.

BLOUSES

Tailored blouses of silk crepes and soft taffetas vie with combinations of chiffon cloth and fancy silks, or plain ones, for suit wear. Some women select the blouse and hat fisrt and have the suit built to correspond, although this seems like putting the cart before the horse to most people. One thing no one can neglect and turn out correctly, and that is the general outline or silhouette which rules the mode from season to season.

FOUNDATIONS

Not every woman realizes that after she has found her type of corset, she should be careful to secure the latest, up-to-date variation of this type if she cares to have her fall raiment assume fashionable lines.

Last season's corset has been given more curve at the sides, additional height above the waist line, and a slightly shorter skirt, in the authoritative autumn showing of Warner's rust proof models, just out. These not only guarantee fit and wear, but shape the figure lines in accordance with the modish silhouette, without any pinching or discomfort whatever.

EMBROIDERIES

Wool embroideries, done with rather crude colorings are among the smartest trimmings of the new clothes outfit, and bead embroideries and ornaments are seen on every side, not only for elaborate indoor frocks, but for the chic ornament that sets off a plain velvet hat, or lends a different air to the dress or suit.

HATS

Hats are either high crowned with small brims, smart and rather severe in line, or low crowned with wide brims that usually roll up a bit in irregular lines except on the sailor shapes which stay with us in their wide becomingness, making them favorites season after season. Shirred velvets and draped turbans of this fabric are new and suit women for whom the stiff shapes are not a good choice. Coque feathers are first favorites and expensive. Hackle is almost as good style and not near so depleting to one's allowance, and comes in a number of smart bands and fancy pieces.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

CARE and practice are the chief requisites for success in the home roasting of coffee. The roasting may be done in the oven, but probably the beginner may find it easier to watch the process and prevent burning if the top of the stove or gas burner is used.

A heavy frying pan with a lid will probably be the most easily available utensil, although many coffee connoisseurs declare that contact with metal of any kind in roasting, grinding or infusing causes deterioration of flavor.

Such enthusiasts insist on having their coffee roasted in heavy earthen pans, pounded in a marble or earthen mortar and infused in an earthen coffee pot. Certainly such coffee is delicious, but is out of question for most of us. In any case avoid tin in dealing with coffee. An aluminium frying pan would be best.

Wash one pound of raw coffee berries in cold water, let dry on a sieve, spread thinly in a heavy pan, then set over the gas, turned quite low, and heat gradually, stirring and shaking occasionally for about fifteen minutes or until yellow; then cover and increase the heat, shaking thoroughly until all the berries are a deep, even cinnamon or chestnut color and have a sort of oily appearance. One burned berry will spoil your coffee, for particular drinkers.

If you like egg in your coffee you may beat one up and add it when the coffee has cooled somewhat, but is still warm, though not hot. Beat with the coffee until every bean is glossy and coated with egg. The egg dries and helps to preserve the flavor, as well as to clear the coffee if made by the boiled method.

If drip coffee—which, of course, is far more wholesome—is preferred the egg should not be used. French coffee roasters sometimes add about two level teaspoonfuls of clarified butter to every pound of roasting coffee and about one level teaspoonful of sugar. These are added while the final browning is being given. Tastes differ as to whether the addition of either, both or neither is best.

Keep the coffee in air tight tins and grind only as required. A little warming in the oven or over the fire immediately before grinding tends to freshen the flavor. Be sure to measure the coffee carefully, so as to secure a uniform brew.

Some Principles Underlying the City-Manager Plan

Richard S. Childs, secretary, the National Short Ballot Association, is the author of a lengthy paper on the subject of the City-Manager Plan, from which the following excerpts are taken:

No Different Than School System

The advantages of having a city manager are obvious to any business man. For counsel, many minds are needed; for execution, a single head is required. Universal business practice demonstrates this as does also the superior luck which we have had with our typical public school systems where a school board does all its work through a hired superintendent. It is important to the plan that the city manager shall be appointive. Any scheme which would make him elective is fatal to the principle. Even the Dayton arrangement which subjects him to direct recall by the people is damaging to the principle involved, since it diverts responsibility from the commission. He must be the loyal servant of the commissioners, else they cannot be made to take responsibility for his acts. He must in no way be independent of them, although there is no objection to allowing the commission to contract with a city manager and promise to keep him in office for a certain number of years, not exceeding their own tenure, subject to mutual penalties. In large private business important managers frequently hold their positions under such contracts and a certain degree of security of office when arranged in this way is no more objectionable in city government than in business. It must, however, not be a charter matter, but something which the commissioners in their own judgment decide to risk.

To make it possible to hire the city manager from out of town not only is helpful in getting expert service, but is highly important to the coming profession of city management. If a city manager cannot look forward to similar positions elsewhere in case he is displaced or outgrows his town, a powerful incentive toward the development of personal efficiency is lost. The fact that the city manager, unlike a mayor, is not necessarily involved in local politics, permits comparative permanence in office of the chief executive of the city, a most important thing to the development of a smoothly running mechanism. In all plans involving elective executives, long tenures are rare. To rid us of the amateur and transient executives which our present mayors are, and to substitute, or at least to permit the substitution of, experienced experts in municipal administration, is enough in itself to justify the coming of the city-manager plan.

How superior, too, is the method thus provided for the interchange of experience among our cities. At present we have various bureaus and publications attempting to do this work in an artificial way—on paper. The city manager of the future will bring to his task the experience of perhaps several cities in which he has himself served. To convey experience spelled out on paper is not to be compared to conveying it thus in a man's head.

The city-manager plan is a mere extension of, or a rank departure from, the Galveston-Des Moines commission plan, according to the point of view, and to some enthusiasts it seems a sacrilege to presume to dissect the mysterious vitals of the commission plan, to dub some features good and some bad and to present proposals for wholesale alterations.

Why Novices Do Fail

Let us tackle it, however. The commission plan makes each of the five commissioners the acting head of a city department. Mr. John Smith, a wholesale grocer, is well liked, has rather a wide acquaintance, belongs to the Order of Stags, has taken his daughters to Europe once and has a solid business reputation. So he is elected a commissioner and is given charge of the department of safety covering police and fire protection. As a student of his departmental budget, he is excellent, for as a business man this is in his line. As a purchaser of new fire engines he is a hopeless novice, on questions of police discipline he becomes the joke of the rank and file. He improves, however, as time goes on and just as he begins to feel comfortable in his command, his term expires. Another novice elected as he was on issues of personal popularity, takes his place and endeavors, more or less vainly, to obtain a firm grasp on the department.

Often the commissioner will lack even the little native ability which is described above. In Wichita a railway switchman was elected; in Topeka, a barber; in Des Moines, a labor leader. And as long as popular government goes on, these things will occur, for a deep-seated instinct in our people, an instinct truer than the reasoning of character-makers, insists on sending to city hall "our own kind of men," men who understand us and whom we understand. "Yonder kid-gloved employer may be better fitted to boss a big city department but he is likely to be more interested in making things pretty up on the hill than in what goes on down here along the river where he never comes. So we elect Bob Jones and maybe things will not run smooth and he will have a lot to learn and he will be getting more money than he ever saw before, but we will see him once in a while and he will do anything he can for us and we will not be expected to take off our hats if we go to ask for something."

Workingman as a Juror

In other words, no matter if commission government does omit to provide for representation and sets up simply five executive offices, all demanding broad administrative ability, the people will nevertheless sweep aside the intent of the charter and elect for considerations of representation just the same! I think the people are right about it, but be they right or wrong, we must cut our cloth according to the fact.

Now Dayton, at its first election under the city-manager plan, has elected a printer—not a master printer, but a typesetter who works at his case for a daily wage. As member of the commission he will contribute his valuable viewpoint to the joint discussion of municipal projects. On some matters he will be an amateur and is due to be harmlessly voted down by his confreres. On other matters his will be the most anxiously awaited voice in the discussion and the other commissioners, merchants to whom the views of labor are mysteries, will defer to his superior knowledge of the popular effect of their proposed acts in certain quarters of the town. But his value as a representative will not be tarnished by his personal inability to administer a large city department successfully. He will have no administrative work to do, no subordinates of his own to discipline, no technical details to supervise. The city-manager plan puts him in the position of a juror, for which he or any intelligent man is fitted, whereas the commission plan puts him in the position of a judge, which demands special training.

From the viewpoint of the people, the city-manager plan is more democratic than the commission plan, because it enlarges the people's field of choice. The commission plan, by implication at least, limits the people in their selection of commissioners to men of the employer class who are competent to hire and direct the labor of many other men. It might very consistently require candidates to demonstrate that they had previously earned in private life salaries equal to those of commissioners—and what a yell of "class rule" would instantly and justifiably be set up against such a charter! In many a city, commission government has been defeated by the labor element who saw no place in it for men of their class and promptly dubbed it "kid-glove rule."

Old Form a Kindergarten Plan

To state the same thing in a different way, the city-manager plan gives the people a better control over the government because it provides a handier handle. They can select the truest representatives unhampered by any considerations of the business experience or salary-earning capacity of their favorites. Moreover, these representatives, after elevtion, have in turn a surer grip on the government through a manager plan than if they were individually compelled to assume departmental direction. A police "system" resisting public opinion, could laugh at the series of short-term amateurs who come and go under the commission plan, but not at the new city manager with his prior experience and his indefinite tenure.

Compare the city-manager plan now with the old mayor-and council plan! The city-manager plan is safer because it eliminates one-man power. The old-style mayor is frequently one-third of the municipal government, sometimes he is practically a clear majority. The city is at the mercy of his whims, his failings, his prejudices. He starts his term with a number of pet projects oblivious to the uncompleted projects of his predecessor. He inaugurates financial reforms and when the work is well started his term expires and his successor, to whom finance is Greek, enters the city hall and begins talking about a city beautiful. Under such vacillating direction the city moves in a wobbly course and constructive civic effort is constantly receiving set-backs and discouragements. No sooner is one executive educated than he is displaced and the process of enlightenment laboriously recommences. The conferences of mayors in certain states represent a crude effort to provide mutual education for these executives but they fail to do much, for the simple reason that each year or two there are wholesale changes or personnel and the mayors meet again as strangers and beginners. Under such circumstances the conference remains always a kindergarten.

Such inherent instability in the chief executive office makes the whole governmental mechanism unstable. Minor city jobs become corresponding insecure and unattractive to good talent. Tenures depend too little on expertness and too much on luck; consequently the civil service employe regards self-education in the technique of his position as waste of energy. Every administrative reform rests on shifting sand. And it will always be so when policies are swayed by single minds instead of a group of minds.

Mayors Rendered Useless

This instability begets further complications arising from the effort to buttress the mayor's weakness with safeguards. The safeguards promptly become incumbrances not only to the public officers but also to the people in attempting to supervise and control those officers. The mayor's appointments are subjected to the necessity of confirmation by the council. Promptly the council becomes the scene of endless intrigues, and being largely immune from administrative responsibilities, dictates appointments regardless of how the mayor's work may suffer. Minor offices and boards are made appointive for long terms, longer than the term of the mayor. Not only is the mayor thus balked in efforts to direct the administration, but the people who presumably elected him to put through a certain program, are balked too. The charter often hedges in the mayor with overmuch language and red tape in a hopeless attempt to keep him from error, until every progressive effort must await charter amendment or a special enabling act. Such devices provide not stability, but rigidity, a vastly different thing.

The city-manager plan abolishes one-man power entirely. It goes even further in this than the commission plan does, for in the latter each commissioner has a sphere of administrative authority into which other commissioners do not intrude, since, if they find things amiss, they can not discharge or even discipline him. The election of a crank as old-tsyle mayor would demoralize a town; his election as a commissioner in the commission plan would demoralize one department; his election as commissioner in the city-manager plan need do no harm whatever since his notions are safely submerged and blended in the composite mind of the commission of which he is simply one voting member.

Commissioners Have Power

But if the crank becomes city manager? Very well. Instead of being, like a mayor or commissioner, subject to intermittent control at elections or to the rare and heavy process of popular recall, he is subject to continuous control and instant removal by a board of popular representatives who have every facility for close supervision and on whom his actions reflect. His follies promptly run plump against the questioning of the stable and sober composite mind of the group. On every question, big or small, the last court of appeal is a group, never a single and possibly opinionated mind. The city manager's appointments, too, are subject to the oversight of the commission which may, if it desires, insist on considering every appointment he makes, but unlike the old-style council, it takes the ultimate responsibility for all appointees. There is no need of giving minor boards a protected tenure since the appointing power is now stabilized. The charter can be primitively simple and short, and can safely extend municipal powers in the most free-handed way. More things can be done by flexible administrative rulings and less and less by wordy inelastic ordinances. The corporation counsel will have little to do in digging up ancient ordinances or interpreting or stretching the charter.

The first-thought objection to the city-manager plan is that it is undemocratic in making its most important single official appointive instead of "directly responsible to the people by election." Democracy, however, consists in controlling public officers—not necessarily in electing them—and the most effective way for the people to get a firm grip on the neck of the city manager is by sending a representative group of citizens down to city hall to see what the manager is doing, with power to fire him and get another any day of the week he is unsatisfactory or insubordinate. Compared with that method, direct election and recall are crude, clumsy, insufficient and relatively undemocratic.

The Plan Is Flexible

The ready applicability of the city-manager plan to cities of different size shows its flexibility. Upon a little town, which can afford just one well-paid officer it fits ideally, better by far than either the commission plan or the mayor-and-council plan.

For a great metropolis it is equally well suited requiring no modifications which affect the basic principle. In fact it is in large cities that the amateurishness of our elective chief executives is most costly. To be sure our city managers must be rank beginners for some years to come while the new profession is getting its membership, but our elective chief executives are amateurs now and our large cities, whose management is highly technical, display the most wretched need of men who will regard municipal management seriously as a life work of high ambitions. And what a noble new profession it is which opens up to the vision of those dozen pioneer city managers of today!

GERMANS HURLED BACK BY FRENCH ON LONG FRONT

with the help of the Germans are advancing on to Rovno, the third of these fortified centers.

The Germans from the south of the Pripet marshes to the region southwest of Vilna are fighting hard and with some success for the stragetic railway system of the Brest-Vilna area.

This railway system is a feeder to the main trunk line, which, as already described, strats at Riga, runs through Dvinsk, Lida and the East Pripet marshes to Rovno and onward to Lemburg, Galicia. Military critics express the opinion that if this line is captured the Austro-German forces will go into winter quarters, for the more important military purpose of bringing any large part of the Russian forces to a decisive battleu nder disadvantageous conditions now seems out of theq uestion, as the autumn rains already have set in.

The three main Russian armies, under Generals Ruszky, Evert and Ivanoff, although reduced and outnumbered, still are full of fight, as is shown by their offensive on the Sereth river, and the Austro-Germans must look to their own defense before reinforcements reach their opponents.

DUMBA SAYS FUSS IS ABOUT NOTHING

New York, Sept. 11.—"Much ado about nothing," was the air assumed by Dr. Constantin Theodor Dumba last night in the St. Regis hotel when he was asked what he had to say about the demand from Washington for his recall as Austro-Hungarian Ambassador. Dr. Dumba amazed the reporters with a sudden outburst against the newspapers, after persisting all day long that he would have nothing to say.

"Too much has been said about this affair altogether," said Dr. Dumba. "In the street cars and among the crowds you hear nothing else discussed. It has become simply unbearable. It wouldn't be so bad if theser eports werec orrect. The newspapers go on publishing things that are absolutely not as they are represented to be and making a sort of sensation. Then they turn around and contradict everything they have said."

He paused, and Prince Homenlohe-Schillingsfurst, his secretary, and Dr. Albert Elder, secretary to Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, stepped forward and touched Dr. Dumba's arm. But the reporters asked if they could not talk for ten minutes with Dr. Dumba after dinner.

"Not a minute!" replied the Ambassador. "All I have to say is that I have—nothing to say. Any statement that I may desire make I will make formally over my signature and will give it out through the Associated Press.

He then left the St. Regis to keep a dinner engagement with Count von Bernstorff at the Ritz-Carlton hotel. Dr. Dumba may leave the city this afternoon for Lenox, Mass.

Probably showers and thunder storms tonight and Tuesday. Fresh shifting winds.

HANNIBAL MAN DROVE HORSE DIRECTLY INTO SHORT-LINE TROLLEY CAR

The cross-town car, in charge of Motorman Crandall and Conductor Hubbell, on its trip to the Lackawanna station at 10:30 Saturday night crashed into a horse and buggy, owned and driven by Fred Raney of Hannibal near the eastern approach to the lower bridge, killing the animal and severely injuring the driver.

According to witnesses the car was traveling at slow speed and was well in control at the time of the accident. Raney was driving west across the bridge and kept his horse directly in the tracks as the trolley approached. When the car was only a few feet from the buggy, witnesses say, the horse reared up in the air and the car crashed into the outfit. One of the horse's hoofs went through the open car window and the impact threw the animal on its back in the buggy, directly upon Raney, who was thrown heavily to the brick pavement. The car stopped and a hurry call was sent to Dr. A. L. Hall, who summoned an ambulance and ordered Raney removed to the hospital. An examination disclosed several bad cuts about the face and head, but no internal injuries or serious injuries of any kind.

Late Saturday night reports were current that Raney had died of his injuries and for a time Motorman Crandall was totally unnerved. Yesterday, however, the hospital authorities reported the man on the road to recovery.

The horse never moved after being struck by the car.

For the past few weeks there has been much censure of the operation of the trolleys in this city, and investigators report that in some instances the cars travel at a 35-mile speed. The city ordinances, according to Chief Dyer, set the limit at eight miles per hour, but according to the trolley company this rule cannot be observed.

"It is impossible to run a car at eight miles and make the schedule time," said a company representative yesterday. "The run covers nine miles, three round trips of a mile and a half each every hour, and with the stops, waits for main line cars, switch lights, and changing ends every ten minutes, it can easily be seen that the company must either run the cars faster or fail to make the proper time. The people want 10 minute service and we must run the cars to make it."

American's Stock Sells Higher Than During Last 9 Years; War the Cause

The acceptance of several large war contracts, among others an order for 500,000 yards of woolen cloth for the soldiers of the Italian army, has had its effect upon the price of stock of the American Woolen Company, which operates one of the largest plants in this city. The common stock sold last week up to 45, the highest price since 1906, when it sold for 48, and the rise is attributed to the operations of Boston and New York banking interests, pending a deal said to be on its way to commmination. There has been a large sale of the stock in Massachusetts because of the fact that the stock is exempted from tax since the company re-incorporated there.

According to reports emanating from the offices of the company in Boston, the year 1916 is expected to be a banner year in the industry because of several large war orders and a good domestic business. The Italian contract is expected to set the company's yard.

BROOKS MAY RECEIVE SUPPORT OF BOLAND'S DEMOCRATIC FRIENDS

James Brooks, already, the selection for Mayor on the Prohibition and Independent tickets, may also be the nominee on the Democratic ticket, if rumors in circulation today are well founded. Tonight at midnight all declinations to nominations made by the respective political parties must be filed in Oswego, and it is reported that John Boland, Democratic selection for Mayor at the primaries, will file his declination tonight, giving the operation of his business as a reason against his candidacy. In this event, it is said, the Democratci party will endorse Mr. Brooks, who has held several offices under the Democratic regime in the past.

Mr. Brooks would not say today that he had any knowledge of Mr. Boland's intentions. The Prohibitionists and Independents expect to elect Mr. Brooks by a large majority over the Republican nominee, Victor C. Lewis.

LLOYD-GEORGE ISSUES WARNING; SAYS ALLIES IN PERIL OF DEFEAT

London, Sept. 13.—That the Central Powers still have an overwhelming superiority in all the material and equipment of war and that the Allies to win must put forth all their strength is the statement made by David Lloyd, Minister of Munitions, in the preface of a book containing his speeches since the outbreak of the war, entitled "Through Terror to Trimumph." Te says:

After twelve months of war my conviction is stronger than ever that this country could not have kept out of it without imperilling its security and its honor. We could not have looked on cynically with folded arms while a country we had given our word to protect was being ravaged, trodden on by one of our own co-trustees. If British women and children were being brutally destroyed on the high seas by German submarines this nation would have insisted on calling the infanticide Empire to a stern reckoning.

"Everything thath as happened since the declaration of war has clearly demonstrated that a military system so regardless of good faith, honorable obligations and the elementary impulses of humanity constitutes a menace to civilization of the most sinister character, and, despite the terrible cost of suppressing it, the well-being of humanity demands that such a system should be challenged and destroyed.

"The fact that events also have shown that the might of this military clique has exceeded the glommiest prognostications provides an additional argument for its destruction.

"Nor have the untoward incidents of the war weakened my faith in ultimate victory, always provided that the nations put forth the whole of their strength ere it is too late. Anything less must lead to defeat. The allied countries have an overwhelming preponderence in the raw material that goes to the making of the equipment of armies, whether in men, money, or accessible metal or machinery. But this material has to be mobilized and utilized.

"It would be idle to pretend that the first twelve months of the war have seen this task accomplished satisfactorily. Had the allies realized in time the full strength of their redoubtable and resourceful foes. Nay, what is more, had they realized their own strength and rosources and taken prompt action to organize them, today we should have witnessed the triumphant spectacle of their guns pouring out a stream of shot and shell which would have deluged the German trenches with fire and scorced the German legions back across their frontier.

"With the resources of Great Britain, France and Russia; yes, of the whole industrial world at the disposal of the allies, the central Powers still have an overwhelming superiority in all the material and equipment of war. The result of this deplorable fact is exactly what might have been foreseen.

"The iron heel of Germany has sunk deeper than ever into Belgian and French soil. Poland is entirely German, and Lithunia is rapidly following. Russian fortresses deemed impregnable are falling like sand castles before the ruthless tide of Teutonic invasion.

"When will that tide recede or be stemmed? As soon as the allies are supplied with an abundance of war materials.

"I am recalling unpleasant facts to stir my countrymen to put forth their strength to amend the situation. There has been a great awakening and prodigious efforts are being made to equip the armies. Nothing but our best can pull us through."

"Are we straining every nerve to make up for lost time? Are we getting all the men we shall want to put into the firing line next year to enable us even to hold our own? Does every man who can help, whether by fighting or providing material, understand clearly that ruin awaits remission?"

NEWSPAPER STORIES ARE BRANDED AS LIES BY PERSONS IN AUTHORITY

Although all opposition to the Commission Government plan ceased, rumors of a coalition with several of the leading politicians were indignantly denied this morning by men in authority among those working for the plan. The report credited by a Syracuse daily that one of the active members of the Taxpayers' Committee has resigned because of disagreements with his fellows, was also vigorously denied this morning by one of the members of that organization. Several other statements said to have been given the correspondent for the same newspaper by an attache of the Chamber of Commerce are declared without foundation, and the correspondent has so far failed to produce anything tangible to verify the statements made.

The supposed obituary of the Business Men's League has appeared several times in a Syracuse daily, which seems to specialize along that line, inasmuch as it has disbanded (through its columns), the Taxpayers' Committee on no less than five occasions, but there is a creditable report that the League will re-enter the fight before the week is out, and has prepared several statements which ar calculated to satisfactorily explain all charges preferred against the Administration by the Taxpayers' Committee.

Meanwhile, it is no secret that the commission plan has won many converts within the past two weeks because of the untiring efforts of the Taxpayers' Committee, and even a prominent Republican politician admitted this morning that he knew of many instances wherein the voter had only recently changed his opinion, because of the fact that charges of mismanagement preferred by the Taxpayers' Committee have remained unanswered by those in authority.

BOLAND-SHAY JUDGMENT NOT REVERSED BY JUDGE

According to information reaching here from Oswego the judgment obtained some time ago by the Oswego Mercantile Agency, Inc, upon a claim of Boland Brothers, cigar manufacturers of this city, against Mr. James Shay of Oswego, before Justice of the Peace White, was not reversed the other day by County Judge Coville, as erroneously reported by the press, but was affirmed and sustained except as to the interest charge, according to papers today filed in the County Clerk's office.

THE BABY MUSTACHE

The moment he entered the car everybody knew that he had one. He was so painfully conscious of it, so utterly obsessed with it. To be sure, it wasn't much to look at. It was so young and tender, so soft and unhealthy appearing. But then it was his own, carefully nurtured and watched over, no doubt, through months of weary waiting. He was not to be blamed that the finished product was unworthy of the effort expended. Perhaps he had nursed it too carefully. A baby overpetted and pampered is likely to be sickly. Daily massage and vaseline are salutary measures, but capable of being abused.

But no such thoughts entered his mind as he hung onto a strap and gazed into infinity. It was his, and he was proud of it. He fingered it carelessly, he smoothed it down and twirled it up; once he tried to twist it around his fingers, but unfortunately it was too short to go around. It would be longer some day. Meanwhile he was content. He was marked as having reached man's full estate. No matter how small or insignificant it might appear to the critical spectator, it was one, and nobody but a full grown man can have one. Why he should want to be a full grown man, or why he should want to have one, are other matters. It wasn't useful, it wasn't beautiful; it was a world of anxiety and trouble.—Indianapolis News.

ALL READ THE NEWSPAPERS

System, a Chicago business publication, has been compiling some statistics setting forth among other things, what working men read. The investigation was made in six large concerns in the Middle West and the East. The questions were suggested by Ford's profit-sharing scheme, and it is only one of the facts which they developed that we shall discuss.

The employes addressed embraced a fairly wide range, and may be supposed to have included men of pretty fair intelligence. Among the industries canvassed were a large New England shoe factory, a motor car factory, a stove foundry and a concern given over to the preservation and packing of fancy foods. The analysis of the reading habits investigated shows the following record:

Newspapers.
Daily papers	97.4 per cent
Magazines.
Fiction	90.4 per cent
Business, technical and trade	63.4 per cent
Reviews and Current events	19.4 per cent
Travel, geographical and outdoor	10.0 per cent
Socialistic	6.1 per cent
Rural	1.2 per cent
None	3.8 per cent
Books.
Novels	38.9 per cent
"Classics"	19.4 per cent
Scientific	9.9 per cent
Very few	7.7 per cent
Business subjects	6.2 per cent
Bible	3.0 per cent
None	22.2 per cent

After all is said, the statistics show conclusively that the newspaper is widely read, in many instances probably to the exclusion of all else. It is to be regretted that more of the so-called classics are not read, but the ordinary factory employe has little time to pour over the classics. He reads his newspaper, a magazine story or a few pages of a novel and his evening is spent. The statistics also reveal the fact that the working men are not spending their time reading Socialistic literature. The percentage is very small.

It is an interesting compilation of figures, revealing conditions that are by no means foreboding in view of the fact that the gatherers of information obtained from some of the workmen letters of this character

"For the past six weeks I have been attending a night class in tool design, three nights a week, and at the present writing am starting on a job of that kind, having increased my wages by 66 2-3 per cent."—Watertown Times.

THE TIME IS UP

The heavy old form of municipal government is doomed. It may not vanish suddenly as if by magic, but its hour is struck. The Commission-Manager form is displacing it because in all instances where tried it is known to prove successful. Not an instance is recorded of a return from the Commission-Manager form to the present, or complex system, known to every taxpayer of Fulton as an expensive experiment. Time and publicity solve all things, even to riddles. The form of government in vogue today in Fulton has had its time, and plenty of it, to prove its failure. It does not show up well under the light of publicity, as its strongest adherents quail at the charges being made of the squeaky workings of the old machine which has done nothing but place upon the taxpayers a burden too heavy for endurance. This burden has grown because under the present form of municipal government it has been impossible to secure full and free publicity and the people remained submissive for no other reason than that they could not help themselves.

Under Commission-Manager form of government there is nothing to hide—nothing can be hidden. One-man power is eliminated and a city attorney ceases to be the city boss. Under the Commission-Manager form of government the city ceases to be at the mercy of the whims, failings and prejudices of a mayor controlled by a city attorney who does not command the respect of any one save the few he elects to serve, who is subject to the same errors that may happen to possess the mayor.

Yes, the old draft-horse must go. His funeral is set for Friday, September 17. The big motortruck—the Commission-Manager form of government—must supplant the old fellow.

But in order to vote this week Friday for a safe and sane form of government it will be necessary to enroll your name tomorrow, provided you have moved from one election district into another.

EDUCATION

The college chap is sure to gain an intermediate success ahead of the boy that is "brought up by hand." But education will never carry you, young men, where character can.

The inspiration that sent men to a seven years' war for independence was the immortal pen of Jefferson.

The courage that made those half-starved men stick at Valley Forge was born in Washington.

But it was Franklin's diplomacy, tact, statesmanship—his ability to impress an alien people with the sense of justice, that brought us the power of France. Lacking this, the problem, to my mind, would have been indefensible.

Franklin was an untaught man. He had magnificent common sense, and many historians credit him with being the greatest man of his time. And yet kick because you didn't get through college.

The professor tells us how to succeed, and before his smooth sentences drop like new coins from this wise man's lips, we are all compelled to forget his wisdom, and go to work.

Instruction is pointing the way. Education is telling how. That's all.

To successfully sail through a fog, proves you are a sailor, and not a professor.

If you lack the polish of a high education, polish up your common sense, and go out and make good. Get all the high education you can, but first be sure it does not interfere with your common sense, or inclination to work. It is not the higher education that hinders—it's the higher ideas that hurt.—Silent Partner Magazine.

HUGO REPORTS RESULT OF 1915 STATE CENSUS

Albany, Sept. 13.—The population of New York State is 9,773,817. This was the official figure transmitted by Secretary of State Francis M. Hugo, to the Constitutional Convention just before adjournment, in accordance with a resolution of the convention. The figures include the inmates of all institutions. Out of the 9,773,817 there are 1,622,125 aliens and 8,151,692 citizens. According to these figures the state has gained only 660,203 in population in the past five years, since the last federal census was taken, or only seven per cent., the smallest gain over any five-year period since 1900.

Does This Cap Fit You

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

ADVERTISING isn't a crucible with which lazy, bigoted and incapable merchants can turn incompetency into success—but one into which brains and tenacity and courage can be poured and changed into dollars. It is only a short cut across the fields—not a moving platform. You can't "get there" without "going some."

It's a game in which the worker—not the shirker—gets rich.

By its measurement every man stands for what he is and for what he does, not for what he was and what he did.

Every day in the advertising world is another day and has to be taken care of with the same energy as its yesterday.

The quitter can't survive where the plugger has the ghost of a chance.

Advertising doesn't take the place of business talent or business management. It simply tells what a business is and how it is managed. The snob whose father created and who is content to live on what was handed to him, can't stand up against the man who knows he must build for himself.

What makes you think that you are entitled to prosper as well as a competitor who works twice as hard for his prosperity?

Why should as many people deal at your store, as patronize a shop that makes an endeavor to get their trade and shows them that it is worth while to come to its doors?

Why should a newspaper send as many customers to you, in half the time it took to fill an establishment which advertised twice as long and paid twice as much for its publicity?

This is the day when the best man wins—after he proves that he is the best man—when the best store wins, when it has shown that it is the best store—when the best goods win, after they've been demonstrated to be the best goods.

If you want the plum you can't get it by lying under the tree with your mouth open waiting for it to drop—too many other men are willing to climb out on the limb and risk their necks in their eagerness to get it away from you.

It is a man's game—this advertising—just hanging on and tugging and straining all the time to get and keep ahead. It is the finite expression of the law of Competition, which sits in blind-folded justice over the markets of the world.

A Quick Transition

By EUNICE BLAKE

"Howdy, Amanda? Excuse me for not comin' sooner when you sent to say you wanted to see me, but I was workin' at the cider press."

"Come in, Mr. Morehouse. It's gittin' chilly nights now. I got some logs blazin' on the hearth, and I'll bring up some birch beer from the cellar."

Josh Morehouse, a bachelor of forty, accepted the invitation and was soon sitting on one end of a sofa drawn before the fire, while Amanda Waters, aged twenty, sat at the other. Beside Josh stood a table on which were a dish of nuts and a bottle of birch beer. After a swig of the beer he began cracking the nuts and invited Amanda to tell him what he could do for her.

"Law sakes, Mr. Morehouse, I don't believe I can."

"Waal, now, that's surprisin'."

"There's somep'n I want you to do for me, but it's awful hard to say it. Fact is, I want to borry you for awhile."

"Borry me?"

Mr. Morehouse paused while cracking a nut and looked at Miss Waters inquiringly.

"You know Enoch Rogers. Well, Enoch has been talkin' soft to me lately, and I don't want him to do it. He's a nice feller, but he's nothin' but a boy. I don't cotton to these kids, but Enoch is givin' me an awful lot of worriment. I don't want to hurt his feelin's, and I can't stand it to have him follerin' me about, makin' people believe I belong to him."

"Why don't you tell him, squar, to keep off?"

"I have. It don't appear to do any good."

"You don't want me to give him a lickin', do you?"

"Oh, no, Mr. Morehouse. I wouldn't have you do that."

"What do you want me to do?"

"Waal, I've reckoned that if you wouldn't mind make b'lieve for awhile I belong to you mebbe he'd give me up and be reckonsiled to get on without me."

"Oh, I see! That's a mighty good way o' lettin' him down."

"His mother and my mother are mighty good friends, and Enoch is a nice boy. So I mustn't do anything to make bad blood. Jest as soon as Enoch sees that some un has got ahead of him he'll draw off and find another gal."

"You don't mean that he'd think you'd look at an old feller like me, do you?"

"La sakes, Mr. Morehouse, how you talk! You're just the age for a woman between eighteen and twenty-five. Girls want a husband to look up to. They don't want a boy that they kin wipe the floor with."

"You don't mean it! Waal, now, I wouldn't 'a' thought any gal except an old maid would want me."

Mr. Morehouse looked very much pleased. The fire crackled merrily, dancing on the fender and gilding articles in the room. The birch beer had a delicious flavor, and the nuts, having been newly gathered, were the same.

"When shall we begin, Mr. Morehouse?" asked Amanda, moving from her end of the sofa toward her make believe lover.

"Begin? Begin what?"

"Why, pertendin' we're engaged."

"Isn't there a big difference between pertendin' and the real thing?"

"Mebbe there is, but if we don't act engaged before people they won't believe we're engaged. Enoch'll think I'm just sayin' I'm engaged to shet him off."

"That wouldn't do, would it? But how are we goin' to act engaged?"

"Laws a-massy, Mr. Morehouse, you don't reckon we're goin' to know how to act engaged without any practicin'!"

"Mebbe not."

Mr. Morehouse took another pull at the birch beer, and when he had set down his mug he found that Amanda had moved to the middle of the sofa and there was barely room for a sheet of paper between them. The fire was crackling and giving out its genial warmth. Mr. Morehouse felt very happy. He looked sidewise at Amanda, while she looked down at her lap, smoothing her dress. He wondered if a borrowed lover practicing to play his part was entitled to take a kiss. He dropped an arm, which was resting on the back of the sofa, to her waist. She did not move. He felt encouraged. He drew her toward him till she was leaning up against him. Her head toppled to the side; he turned her face, and his lips were drawn magnetically to hers.

"By jinx," he exclaimed. "I wonder if bein' a real lover is better'n a borryed one!"

"Nobody kin tell that without tryin'," said Amanda.

Another kiss helped him on, and still another helped him on further, till at last, as he afterward said, "the words just came right out by themselves without my havin' anything to do with it."

When Josh Morehouse went home that evening he was astonished at remembering that he had stood within an hour in three different positions—friend, pretended lover and betrothed.

"It beats anything," he said to himself, slapping his knee, "how suddent some things come about. Just think that Mandy's wantin' to borry me to head off Enoch Rogers should 'a' made a match between her and me!"

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Loss of Weight.

One of the early symptoms of tuberculosis is a loss of weight. Any decided decreases should be watched with suspicion. It often means that the general bodily functions are not all that they should be. It is certain, under any circumstances, to indicate that one's physical resistance is being lowered, and this in itself opens the way to unusual chances of disease.

If this loss in weight is accompanied by loss of appetite, night sweats or a persistent cough or cold a physician should be consulted and nourishing food, plenty of rest and long hours of sleep in the fresh air should be resorted to in an effort to build up the body.

People will neglect themselves for months when decreasing weight should warn them as surely as the falling barometer denotes a coming storm that their physical well being is in jeopardy.

MONT PELEE AS IT IS TODAY.

Its Appearance Thirteen Years After Its Fearful Eruption.

Since its outbursts in 1902-3 Mont Pelee has simmered down to a commonplace volcano, and now vegetation has re-established itself to the summit of the mountain, and even the forest is beginning to reassert itself. The whole aspect of this side of the volcano is verdant and peaceful and gives no indication of the devastation of thirteen years ago. Even the rocks of the new cone are more or less thickly coated with moss, while the sides and top of the old cone are covered with grass, ferns and bushes in addition to the moss and lichens.

On the summit plateau are found an abundance of red raspberry bushes bearing flowers and green and ripe fruit. Sugar plantations on the west side of Mont Pelee have been reinstated as far as the Roxelane river, within the border of the original zone of annihilation, while the ruined city of St. Pierre now contains about thirty new buildings of durable construction and a resident population of between 200 and 300 people.

The zones stretching down the southwest side of the volcano lying between the Seche and Blanche rivers, which was the route traversed by hundreds or perhaps thousands of destructive eruption clouds, still lie drear and desolate, because the soil was completely swept away by the blasts, and the material left behind as well as that added by the eruption is too porous for the retention of the water necessary to restore it to fertility.—Argonaut.

Bernhardt's Wish.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, whose leg was recently amputated, is cured. To see her walk one could doubt that she had been maimed, thanks to the miracles of surgery and mechanics. She is much more courageous than heretofore. She looks at her articulated leg and smiles. "It pleases me," she says, "and it would please me entirely if it should be celebrated by two of my best friends—one a poet and the other a painter. I wish that the adorable Edmond Rostand would celebrate it in a little poem and that my faithful Clairin would make it the subject of a beautiful drawing." Rostand and Clairin have been apprised of the wish of the grand tragedienne and it is said that they will not delay to respond to it.—Cri de Paris.

HOME TOWN HELPS

KEEPING THE CITY CLEAN

Washington Physician Tells of the Importance of the Work That Has Been Done.

"If Washington residents continue cleaning up this week as they did last week," remarked a Washington physician, "a long step will be taken in the direction of making the national capital a flyless, dirtless and diseaseless city during the coming summer.

"Dirt, flies and disease go hand in hand. Get rid of the dirt, and the flies have nowhere to breed and propagate. Eliminate the flies, and three-fourths of the sickness of summer will be prevented.

"There is no more reason for permitting accumulations of decaying rubbish, heaps of stable manure and the like to remain in alleys, on vacant lots, or hidden in back yards, than for allowing such refuse to exist in the front yard or the open public street," the doctor continued. "Property owners, householders and health officials alike would refuse to permit the continuance in exposed places of such debris and filth, the latter from sanitary reasons and the former out of pride.

"But often the health authorities cannot know of such accumulations hidden in back yards with high board fences, and inspectors fail to discover them in out-of-the-way alleys, etc. In such cases the householder or the property owner ought to take a sufficient degree of pride in his home or his property to see that the rubbish is hauled away; if he doesn't do it he ought to be prosecuted, the same as would be the case if he permitted any other nuisance to remain unabated.

"Flies carry disease of many kinds, all of them filth diseases. Typhoid fever is the chief among these, although a score of the co-called 'summer ailments' are borne by flies. Great progress has been made in Washington in the last few years in eliminating the fly by destroying the breeding places where the insects propagate and from which they spread to all the houses in the neighborhood. Much more can be done along this line if citizens generally will continue to cooperate in a whole-hearted manner in the clean-up activities, and it is not too much to say that continuance of campaigns such as that of this spring and several preceding springs may be expected, in a few years, to make flies as rare in the District of Columbia as buzzards are in Maine."—Washington Star.

In Setting Plants.

In setting any kind of plants make sure that the roots are well spread out. The most important thing is to bring the soil into as close contact with the roots as possible. The root can take no moisture from the soil in a natural condition until the soil is so close to the root that capillary water flows from the water film around the soil particles to the root. We water newly set plants for two purposes. 1. To keep alive the plant till it can get to taking in water naturally, without the help of water artificially supplied. 2. To wash the earth particles more closely about the roots and so help bring about an early contact of the roots with the soil. Some do not know this and try purposely to leave the soil as light about the roots as possible, thinking the roots can thus penetrate it easier. The penetrating power of roots is beyond the calculation of most people. Roots will go wherever there is food, moisture and air, no matter how firmly the soil may be packed. Corn roots are frequently found four feet below the surface, having passed through layers of earth very firm and which, of course, had never been disturbed by the plow.

Roses in Lath Houses.

In choosing roses for planting in lath houses or places somewhat shady, extreme care must be paid to choosing sorts known to be free from mildew. First-class drainage of soil will do much to overcome this fungus and it will prove a pleasant surprise to see how many roses will thrive in [illegible] with little or no sun. A concrete building was erected on a lot adjoining a garden, on the south side. This threw in complete shade a half-dozen roses, and several others were thereafter in partial shade. It was a pleasant surprise to note that in three years but two have been troubled with mildew, not badly however, and only at such times as others in full sun were also affected.

Put Well Away From the House.

The old-fashioned idea of having the well in close proximity to the house is being relegated to the discard as fast as a growing knowledge of sanitary science can put it there. To locate the well away from the zone of possible contamination and at the same time meet the requirements of house, barn, garage and garden, is causing a decline in the demand for the long-popular cheap pump. The growing demand for modern conveniences in suburban districts is creating a demand for a better grade of pumps.

LOVE LINKED WITH DEATH.

Where Women Propose and if Rejected Must Kill Themselves.

In the Pacific ocean, between Fiji, New Guinea, New Caledonia and the continent of Australia, lies the Melanesian group of islands, where head hunters and cannibals abound. Strange and grewsome as are many of the customs of the tribes, there are some that are most romantic. For instance, on the island of Tucopia the women propose marriage instead of the men.

When a girl of Tucopia sees a man whom she thinks she would like to have for her husband she does not rush up to him and ask him to marry her. On the contrary, she gives the subject deep thought and often the man a most careful investigation before she "pops the question." The reason is that his answer spells life or death to her.

It is a tribal law that any woman who has been refused must forthwith kill herself. Therefore a woman asks a man's hand only when she feels sure that his answer will be the happy one.

Many are the strange and seemingly inexplicable questions with which the women of Tucopia ply the stranger who cannot realize the personal motive back of the solicitude of the dusky belles who inquire if he is married or not and the state of his wife's health. Romances are consequently very apt to turn out in happy marriage.

But there have been innumerable instances when a poor girl, smitten by the newcomer's charms, has been compelled to kill herself because the man with whom she has fallen in love has had to refuse to marry her.

Baldness with the women of Tucopia is a sign of beauty, and never until she is bald does a Tucopia woman become fully convinced that she is really lovely.

But, bald or not, she takes great care whom she asks to marry her, for the tribal law has never been known to fail. If a rejected woman does not kill herself she is executed under the most dishonorable conditions by the leaders of the tribe.—Buffalo News.

Making Alloys Is an Art.

Great art is requisite in making alloys. It is true that they are readily formed by melting metals together in a crucible or in properly constructed furnaces, but it is necessary to insure perfect fusion and to prevent loss. Zinc is a volatile, inflammable metal and easily catches fire. Indeed, it is not at all uncommon to find that two alloys of exactly the same component parts differ very materially in properties in consequence of a difference in the mode of preparation or in the care bestowed upon them.

Makes a Good Bluff.

"I notice that Mr. Bulkins always occupies a seat on the platform when there is a public meeting."

"Yes. He's been doing that for twenty years."

"He must be a man of some importance in the community."

"No. He's not at all important, and I don't believe he was ever invited to sit on a platform, but he puts on a silk hat and a frock coat and nobody has the courage to snub him."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

$1,135,100,000 FOR WHEAT

Of This Huge Sum It Is Said That the Farmers Will Get $960,000,000—All Products Except Apples Show Tremendous Increase In Bulk and Value. The Government's Figures.

YIELD, BUSHELS.	Aug. 1, 1915.	Change from 1914 final.
Wheat	966,000,000	+ 72,000,000
Corn	2,918,000,000	+265,000,000

Apples	205,000,000	—48,000,000
Peaches	60,000,000	+ 8,000,000
Hay	*75,000,000	+ *5,000,000

† Pounds. * Tons.

The total value of this year's food crops in the United States will be over $5,300,000,000. Of this total wheat makes up $1,135,100,000, corn $1,750,000,000, oats $841,000,000 and hay $975,000,000.

Uncle Sam's harvest for this year would—

Finance the construction of [illegible] Panama canals, complete and ready for operation, at an estimated cost of $400,000,000 apiece.

Pay for the cost of the whole European war for more than three months.

Build the United States a fleet of 310 super-Dreadnoughts at $17,000,000 per ship.

The actual quantities of grain and forage involved would feed every soldier under arms in Europe and supply grain and forage for their horses for rather more than ten years and would similarly feed the entire United States army for nearly 2,000 years.

This year's wheat crop in the United States will probably form one-fourth of the world's total, the year's corn crop three-fourths of the world's total and the oats crop nearly one-third of the world's total.

No nation in the history of the world ever harvested a crop remotely to be compared, either in bulk or in value, with the harvest of grain and fruit which the farmers of the United States are preparing to gather. A large part of it will be sold to Europe's hungry and fighting millions.

Remarkable as was the crop of 1914, in itself far excelling all previous records, the reports of the experts of the department of agriculture show that the harvest of 1915 will exceed it in almost every particular. The apple yield alone among important products will fall below the 1914 harvest.

The wheat harvest this fall may possibly, for the first time in the history of the country, go above a billion bushels. The present and conservative estimates of the department of agriculture call for a yield of 966,000,000 bushels. On the markets experts on prices calculate this crop will stand the country in about $1,135,160,000. The farmers are expected to put $960,000,000 of this directly in their own pockets.

Due to Big Acreage.

The increase in the wheat crop is practically entirely due to the increased acreage under cultivation this year, as the average yield per acre is expected to fall slightly below that of last year, being put at 16.3 bushels to the acre, where last year's yield was 16.6 bushels to the acre.

The corn crop, like the wheat, is threatening to pass another memorable mark by turning out 3,000,000,000 bushels, the advance estimate now being 2,918,000,000 bushels. This is an increase over last year's yield of 245,000,000 bushels. Marketed at 60 cents a bushel, this crop will be worth $1,750,800,000 to the country.

The expansion of the corn crop is due at once to increased acreage under cultivation, and to a better yield per acre, the acre yield having been increased, in spite of the wet weather, from 25.8 bushels to 26.7 bushels. This crop will probably represent close to three-fourths the world's total production.

The oat crop, the third of the thre great leaders, has increased over last year's record by nearly 25 per cent, the figures being for this year 1,402,000,000 bushels; for last year, 1,141,000,0000 bushels. Placed on the market the crop will bring, it is estimated, about $841,200,000. Thus these three crops alone represent a marketable addition to the nation's wealth of nearly $4,000,000,000.

Other Record Harvests.

The year's barley crop will, it is estimated, amount to 217,000,000 bushels, or 22,000,000 more than last year; the rye crop has been increased from 43,000,000 to 44,000,000 bushels; the rice crop from 24,000,000 to 30,000,000 bushels. Eighteen million bushels of buckwheat have been raised, as against 17,000,000 in 1914.

Smokers will be pleased to know that the department of agriculture estimates that there will be harvested 1,083,000,000 pounds of tobacco in the United States, where but 1,035,000,000 pounds were gathered in 1914.

Those Dear Girls.

Alice (just engaged)—What do you think Jack said to me last night? That if he had to choose either me or $10,000 he wouldn't look at the money. Marie—Dear, loyal fellow! Wouldn't like to risk the temptation, I suppose.—Boston Transcript.

Too Timid.

Green—Has fortune never knocked at Brown's door? White—Oh, yes, but Brown didn't dare open it for fear 'twas a bill collector!—New York American.

A Judge's Decision.

Under the arbitration laws of Australia courts have the power to order that preference be given unionists by employers. In a recent case Judge Cussen of the arbitration court ruled: "I give preference to unionists in this case because I am convinced that the man who gives a considerable portion of his time each week and a considerable portion of his earnings each week to try to improve the conditions in which he lives is justly entitled to more consideration than the man who remains outside and will not give a portion of his time or a fraction of his money to better the conditions of himself and those who are dependent upon his earnings."

Pass Mothers' Pension Bill.

The Wisconsin state assembly has passed the mothers' pension bill, which compels all counties to appropriate aid for dependent children and permits them to be cared for by the mother's relatives or friends in the discretion of the county judge. A monthly aid of $15 for the first child and $10 for the second child is allowed.

Labor Temple Assured.

The Labor Temple Building association of Dallas, Tex., has signed a contract for the construction of a labor temple in the city. The building will have three stories and a basement and will cost $48,000.

Western India's Food.

Ninety per cent of the population of western India is dependent upon fish for sustenance.

NOTES OF LABOR.

The Pond Machine Tool company of Plainfield, N. J., was granted a wage increase of 10 per cent with the eight hour day to its 800 employees.

Wage differences between the elevated lines of Chicago and their operators will be arbitrated, just as the surface line difficulties were settled.

Officials of the American Federation of Labor will conduct an investigation of the capsizing of the steamer Eastland at Chicago with a loss of hundreds of lives.

Nearly 7,000 men benefited by general increases in wages announced by the Standard Oil company for its employees in its three plants in New Jersey. The increase averages about 10 per cent.

The Colt Firearms Manufacturing company of Hartford, Conn., recently announced a generous bonus to its employees, and the Locomobile Company of America, at Bridgeport, announced that it would share profits with its men.

Tearing Sounds.

The ear can be trained to accustom itself to the sound of the tearing of various materials. The noise accompanying the tearing of cotton is unlike that of linen. The warp has its voice and the filling quite another, the former being shrill, while the latter is apt to be dull.

W. C. T. UNION ELECT OFFICERS

Friday's Session One of Profit, Showing Also That Nearly Two Hundred Women Are Paying Dues.

More than ninety members of the local W. C. T. U. met in the Presbyterian church last Friday afternoon to hold the annual session and elect officers for the ensuing year.

Reports from superintendents of the various departments, Corresponding Secretary, Secretary and Treasurer, were of much interest and showed a large amount of work accomplished.

The Union now numbers about 180 paid members.

Sixty-one new members this year; one memorial member, Mr. Henry Crane, and seven honorary members. At a call for charter members present six arose. Six visitors from the Free Methodist conference were introduced to the meeting, among whom was Miss Root, State Superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion.

A very pleasing letter was read from Mr. H. J. Wilson, Secretary of the Official Board of the First M. E. church of this city, in which in their behalf he generously returned to the W. C. T. U. the check of $15 they had given for the use of the church during the Y. P. B. convention in July. This was received with a rising vote of thanks.

After calling the first vice-president to the chair, the president, Mrs. Sylvester, stepped aside to say, "We have given our vote of thanks by arising as one person, and we do most heartily appreciate this generous action and I would like to further show our gratitude in a morel asting way, by using this to send a member of that church to the State convention to be held in Ithaca September 30 to October 4. As that delegate I would name one who has always given such faithful service as our secretary, a charter member and a member of the First M. E. church, Mrs. W. A. Gifford. This was unanimously carried.

That Mrs. Barrett be made a member of the Union during her residence in Fulton, and that the State newspaper be also sent to Rev. J. W. Barrett. All of which was carried.

After the President had resumed the chair, and some other business had been completed, Mrs. R. B. Crockett stepped forward and very gracefully presented Mrs. Sylvester, in behalf of the Union, with a five-dollar gold piece in token of love and appreciation of her unceasing devotion and effort for the work of the cause and of the local W. C. T. U.

Our President has been present and presided at every meeting. She has made and given silk workbags to every member who had been present, wearing the white bow, at every meeting; of these there were seven; one to the lady securing the greatest number of new members. One each to the Treasurer and Recording Secretary for faithful attendance and service during the year, and especially during the Y. P. B. convention.

The West Side Park committee sent thanks for gift of fountain for the park.

Following the serving of refreshments the following officers were elected:

President—Mrs. Wm. Sylvester.

1st Vice-President—Mrs. W. McCully, Presbyterian church.

2nd Vice-President—Mrs. T. J. Redhead, State Street church; Mrs. F. E. Munger, First M. E. church; Mrs. H. Young, Free Methodist church; Mrs. Lee Edgarton, Congregational church Mrs. E. E. Hart, Baptist church; Mrs. G. B. Deuel, Episcopal church.

Recording Secretary—Mrs. W. A. Gifford.

Corresponding Secretary—Mrs. Edna Moore.

Treasurer—Mrs. R. B. McRea.

Mrs. W. White 2nd delegate to the State convention.

The next meeting will be held in the Congregational church October 29.

FLEMING—MUNGER

Mr. Earl C. Fleming and Miss Lucy Munger, both of Antwerp, were married by the Rev. J. W. Barrett at the First M. E. parsonage Saturday evening. Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Munger attended the young people, who are spending their honeymoon at the home of the Mungers in East 5th st. Mrs. Fleming is a niece of Mr. Munger and is one of Antwerp's popular young women. At the conclusion of their wedding trip they will make their home in Antwerp.

R. BENTON HOWARD BURIED YESTERDAY

The funeral of R. Benton Howard of the Whittaker road, who received injuries that resulted in his death on Thursday when his touring car crashed through a fence near Plainville, was held from the home of his father, William B. Howard, on the Whittaker road, yesterday afternoon at two o'clock. Rev. Charles S. Robertson, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, officiated, and burial was made in Mt. Adnah.

WILLIAM HENRY GAYER

William Henry Gayer, 59, died yesterday morning at his home in Elbridge.

He was born at Watertown and for twenty-five years was superintendent in a paper mill at Skaneateles. For the past ten years he had lived in Elbridge, and was senior partner of the firm of W. H. Gayer & Son Drug Company of this city.

Surviving are his son, Wade E. Gayer, and daughter, Mrs. S. E. MacCullum, of Elbridge. The funeral will beh eld at 8 a. m. Tuesday, Rev. S. W. Dowlinson officiating, and burial will be at Brownville.

MRS. BLANN BURIED.

The funeral of Mrs. Sarah Blann, 66, who died Friday at her home in Park st., was held this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. She is survived by her husband, A. W. Blann, two sons, Herbert W., of this city, and Jessie A., of Phoenix. One daughter also survives, Mrs. Mabel Packard of Jersey Shore, Pa., and one sister, Mrs. Anna Morrison, and two brothers, Harvey Heatherley, of Oswego, and R. J. Heatherley, of Syracuse. The Rev. H. D. Holmes officiated and burial was made in Mt. Adnah cemetery.

KNOCKED DOWN BY REAR END OF CAR

Gordon Otis, waiting for a main line car to pass at the corner of Oneida and First sts., yesterday afternoon, did not allow for the swing of the rear end of the car on the curve at that point, and was knocked down and rolled for several feet when the car struck him. Mr. Otis was not seriously hurt.

NEWS WRITER IS ROBBED OF CASH

He Doesn't Miss the Money But Dislikes Thought That Politicians Should Retaliate.

The office of R. Harold Robertson, official corespondent and business representative of the Syracuse Herald in this city, was entered Friday night and robbed by a gang of thugs, according to the story Editor Robertson told the police yesterday. So far as he knows, the only loot amounted to twenty cents, the payment of an advertising account, which was laying in the strong drawer of the desk. Mr. Robertson, however, was greatly alarmed when he found his office had been visited by marauders because of the fact that several important private interviews and political correspondence were left in the desk early in the evening. These were found intact, however, but Mr. Robertson has destroyed the important papers and states that he will henceforth carry these documents upon his person.

Mr. Robertson believes the robbery is the culmination of a series of threats he has received from local politicians who do not approve of his methods of handling local political affairs. He has fitted his office with burglar alarms which connect directly with the police station and his home, and in the future will be prepared to resist the entrance of invaders with the assistance of his secretary, Frederic Martin.

REPUBLICAN CLUB HAD GOOD TIME YESTERDAY

Several members of the First Ward Republican club, recently organized, enjoyed a corn roast at the First Ward camp near Pathfinder Island yesterday afternoon. Chicken, sweet corn, sweet potatoes and plenty of ginger-pop were the features of the menu, which was prepared by Franklyn Blake, official chef. Games were enjoyed during the afternoon. About 15 members of the organization were present.

THE EYES OF ENVY

Are turned on the woman whose clothes mark her apart from the crowd. They proclaim her one of discriminating taste, for to select such a garment from the many that are seen on every hand requires a knowledge and appreciation of style, material, fit and wearing qualities that few possess. But these are characteristics that are found in every Printzess coat or suit. They confer on their wearer the compliment of good taste, assure her the approval of those most critical in matters of dress and the envy of those who have not found the secret.

CONFERENCE IS NOW CLOSED

Rev. C. C. Watson Assigned to Oneida Church—Delegates Remained Over Sunday, Leaving Today.

The Susquehanna conference of the Free Methodist church in this city began its business session Saturday morning, with song, after which prayer was offered by Rev. Charles Hudson, and a Scripture lesson read by Rev. T. Whiffin. The minutes of the previous meeting were read, after which, Rev. H. L. Crockett having been nominated Superintendent of the Band Workers' Training Home, was elected to that office.

During this session Rev. J. W. Barrett of the First M. E. church was introduced to the conference and invited to an honorary seat.

At the afternoon session Rev. Mr. Babcock took up a collection for the benefit of the Gerry Home, after which Rev. A. Smith gave an interesting address in which he told some of his experiences in his early life as a pastor.

The business session re-opened after this service and after transacting the remaining business of the conference the appointments were read by Bishop R. B. Jones. The appointments follow

PITCHING IN BASEBALL.

Lack of Control Will Render Useless All Other Ability.

"In my ten years' connection with the American league as umpire I have seen the fact proved again and again that control is absolutely necessary to win success," writes Billy Evans in St. Nicholas.

"The more one studies the different features of the art of pitching the more clearly does he see the value that control plays in the success of the pitcher.

"If the pitcher knows the weakness of the batter and intends giving him a fast ball on the inside and then deliberately pitches to the opposite side his knowledge of the batter is of no use to him. Lack of control has rendered his knowledge useless.

"If he knows the shortstop is to cover and then pitches a ball to the batter that makes it easy for him to hit through the position vacated by the shortstop he nullifies the strength of his infield. Lack of control is again the cause.

"If the catcher signals for a waste ball in order to be in a better position to throw out a runner trying to steal and instead he gets the ball right over the plate he is handicapping the catcher. Lack of control is again the cause.

"After all, most of the finer points of pitching are based on ability to control the ball."

Stonehenge.

No sooner had we set foot on the first swell of plain than I became aware of what looked like a herd of elephants, half a mile ahead. They did not move, and slowly it dawned upon me that this was Stonehenge. A few minutes later, seated within the circles of those enormous stones, I was asking myself the old questions that so many travelers have asked. For worship, at least, these rude masses were erected; that seems fairly certain. And to commemorate a battle, if one may judge from the barrows that crown the neighboring hillocks. Religion and war—the two powers that have charmed and ruled and tortured the world. So mysterious is the whole of life, alike moral and physical, that the haunting wonder of Stonehenge was neither increased nor lessened by what then I saw.—Scribner's.

Many Species of Banana.

The banana as a substitute for the potato would have one drawback. It has been found that those who live mainly upon this article of diet soon tend to become what is politely called "tubby." The banana with which we are all familiar is only one of many useful species. Cochin China produces a single fruit that is an ample meal for three men, and in East Africa an intoxicating drink is made from the native banana.—London Chronicle.

HEALTHY FARMS ARE NEEDED

Dr. Liberty Hyde Bailey Argues for Higher Standards of Rural Sanitation in the State.

Albany, September 13.—Strong arguments for better standards of farm sanitation are presented in the current number of the Health News, the official publication of the State Department of Health, by Dr. Liberty Hyde Bailey, former Director of the College of Agriculture, Cornell University.

"Good soil, good seed, good animals, good tools, good men—these are the foundation of a good agriculture and a good country life," says Dr. Bailey. "We have been taught very much in these latter years about the first four of these—the soil, how to know it and how to treat it, with bulletins in much detail; the seed—there are professors of plant breeding and there is no end of good advice from the institutions; the animals—exhibitions have been held, feeding tests have been made, diseases put under control, books and books have been thinks he knows a good cow and a good horse; the tools and machines—farming would now be impossible without them and many persons are making careful experiments with machines of various types.

"We do not find the same kind of attention given by the institutions to men and women, that they may be well born, well reared, well fed, with sound teeth, stomachs that will carry them through life, lungs that will provide the power; and yet the effectiveness of soil and seed, of animals and machines, all depend on the man to do his part and on the woman to do her part.

"We now recognize it to be a part of community action to look after the health of all those who comprise the community. A man cannot have mumps unto himself. Every sick man or woman or child lowers the economic efficiency of a community or neighborhood; many persons feel the effects and the weight of it; it is just as much our obligation to try to overcome this disadvantage as to meet any other disadvantages, and even more so, seeing that all men are kin. The old pride that some of us used to have in being ill is out of place in this latter day world; now we search for the cause and try to place the responsibility."

Migratory Bird Law to be Enforced; Gunners Warned to Protect Fowl

Washington, D. C., Spe.t 13.—With the approach of the open season for shooting wild fowl, the United States Department of Agriculture is warning sportsmen that the Federal regulations as sachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Orderstanding has arisen from the fact that the various State laws do not always conform to the Federal regulations. This is regarded as unfortunate, but in such cases the Department must insist upon the observance of the Federal regulations.

The Department will consider any recommendations submitted in good faith for the amendment of the regulations, but it will hold no public hearings thereon, nor will it amend the regulations prior to October 15, 1915. It is the purpose of the Department to conform the regulations to the wishes of the majority of sportsmen so far as it can be done and at the same time give wild fowl the necessary protection.

Federal regulations divide the United States into two zones. Zone No. 1, the breeding zone, includes the States of Oregon, Idaho, Colorado, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and all states north of them. Zone No. 2, the wintering zone, includes all States south of those named.

The regulations prescribe seasons as follows:

Open season for migratory birds in 1915 under Federal regulations—Zone No. 1:

Waterfowl—September 1 to December 16. Exceptions; Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Connecicut, Pennsylvania, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, October 1 to January 16.

New Jersey, November 1 to Febrlary 1; Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wisconsin, September 7, to December 1.

Rails, Coots, Gallinules—Exceptions: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, August 15 to December 1; Connecticut, Michigan, New York, Long Island, September 16 to December 1; Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wisconsin, September 7 to December 1; Oregon, Washington, October 1 to January 10.

Woodcock—Exceptions: Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, October 10 to December 1; Rhode Island, November 1 to December 1; Pennsylvania, Long Island, October 15 to December 1.

Shore Birds, Black-Breasted and Golden Plover, Jacksnipe, Yellowlegs, September 1 to December 16; Exceptions: Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Long Island, August 15 to December 1; New York (except Long Island), September 16 to December 1; Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wisconsin, September 7 to December 1; Oregon, Washington, October 1 to December 16.

Insectivorous birds protected indefinitely. Band-tailed pigeons, cranes, swans, curlew, smaller shore birds, and wood ducks protected until September 1, 1918. Rails in Vermont and woodcock in Illinois also protected until 1918.

Shooting prohibited between sunset and sunrise; or at any time on sections of upper Mississippi and Missouri rivers after January 1, 1915.

Open season for migratory birds in 1915 under Federal regulations—Zone No. 2:

Waterfowl, October 1 to January 16—Exceptions: Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, November 1 to February 1; Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, November 20 to February 16; Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, September 15 to February 1; Arizona, California, Texas, October 15 to February 1.

Rails, Coots, Gallinules—September 1 to December 1. Exceptions: Tennessee, Utah, October 1 to December 1; Missouri, September 15 to January 1; Louisiana, November 1 to February 1; Arizona, California (coots), October 15 to February 1.

Woodcock—November 1 to January 1. Exceptions: Delaware, Louisiana, November 16 to January 1; West Virginia, October 1 to December 1; Georgia, December 1 to January 1.

Shore Birds, Black-breasted and Golden Plover, Jacksnipe and Yellowlegs: September 1 to December 16. Exceptions: Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, November 20 to February 1; Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, November 1 to February 1; Tennessee, October 1 to December 16; Arizona, California, October 15 to February 1; Utah (snipe), October 1 to December 16; Utah (plover and yellowlegs), September 1, 1918.

Insectivorous birds protected indefinitely. Band-tailed pigeons, cranes, swans, curlew, and smaller shore birds protected until September 1, 1918; woodducts in Kansas and West Virginia, rails and woodducks in California, and woodcocks in Missouri are also protected until September 1, 1918.

Shooting prohibited between sunset and sunrise; or at any time on the Mississippi river getween Minneapolis and Memphis, after January 1, 1915.

LEADER PITTS IS ACCUSED

Chairman Farmer Alleges the Prohibitionist is Trying to Capture National Progressive Party.

All is not harmony between the regulars, led by B. Coe Turner and L. J. Farmer and C. E. Pitts, Prohibition leader. The first named gentlemen have filed objections to the petitions endorsing the candidacy of the Prohibition candidate for county office filed in the name of the National Progressive party. The election commissioners will act today on the objections filed.

Mr. Farmer alleges that the petitions endorsing Samuel J. Sturdevant for member of assembly, Elmer H. Benedict for county clerk and Dr. J. B. Ringland, Dr. H. M. Doane and E. R. Chesbro for coroners were illegal and void because of not being signed by a sufficient number of enrolled voters. Among the objections made are the following:

That the petitions are three in number and not one petition as required by law.

That the vacancy committee, B. C. Turner, Andrew Pospesel and G. A. Medler, was named without the consent of the members.

That there are 71 enrolled voters of the National Progressive party and that 15 are necessary to make a legal petition.

That the petition was filed by seventeen enrolled voters, but that two of these had already signed peitions designating candidates for the same offices, reducing the number to fifteen, and that one, Harry Allen, having moved from his place of residence, is not a legally enrolled voter. That the number of signatures is reduced to fourteen, making the petition illegal and void.

That William Foot did not take a proper oath, that several of the signatures were obtained through misrepresentation, it being claimed by the person who circulated the same that B. C. Turner and others in the party intended to let the matter go by default.

That the statement made to secure signatures that B. C. Turner said he was too busy to attend to the matter is false.

A number of oher allegations are made to the effect that Clarence E. Pitts of the Prohibition party is endeavoring to secure control of the National Progressives.

It is the belief of persons acquainted with the procedure that if the allegations are substantiated the petitions were filed to the National Progressives petitions endorsing C. W. Dings and the Prohibition city ticket.

WHY THE HOME PAPER

An advertisement writer says: "Have you ever asked yourself why you take your Home Paper, or why it is necessary to have a Home Paper?

HERE IS THE WHY

The big city daily comes to you and gives you the important news of the outside world, but you and the home are too small for a place in its columns.

About its only thought of you is the money it gets from you.

It deals in world matters and is of value to you because through it you obtain much of your knowledge of the greater affairs of life.

But it utterly ignores you and yours.

Hence the local paper, and likewise your reason for taking the local paper.

You cannot exist without a knowledge of the affairs of your home community.

You must know of the plans and of the work of the local authorities, and you must know of the doings of the churches, and of the community in general.

You cannot obtain this knowledge from the big city paper, but you can and do find it in the columns of the home paper.

You buy the big city daily because you must know of the progress of the world, for your mind is developing day by day and demands this greater fund of information.

But your mind craves even a more intimate knowledge of affairs that are vital to the interests of you and yours, and these things you find only in the home paper.

To the great city daily you are but as a single pebble upon the beach, a drifting sand of the desert.

But to the home paper you are one of us, an important factor in the community, a force with which to be reckoned.

A disrupted and disintegrating community means a shrinkage and loss in property values and a stagnant public mind. Hence the home paper has an ever watchful eye to the interests of the community and of yourself, for only in the preservation of the community and of yourself can the home paper hope for a continued existence.

The home paper is your friend and you know it.

And because you are loyal to your friends and to the community you believe in the home paper and its ceaseless work for home and home people.

Your interests and those of the home paper are identical, and you need it quite as much as it needs you.

And the man who recognizes the necessity for community of interests as demonstrated in

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

CHAPTER III—Continued.

"You young fool, didn't you just unlock it?" roared his father.

"So I did," said Rodney nervously.

Mary in the meanwhile had retreated to her typewriter, and now began typifying violently.

"Stop that noise," shouted Mr. Martin.

The noise ceased immediately, and Rodney looked at her discouraged. She motioned to him to go on. Meanwhile Martin painfully limped to a chair by a small table and sank into it, his foot giving him another twinge.

"Ouch! Oh, my poor foot!" he moaned.

Rodney hastily picked up a footstool and came with it to his father.

"I'm afraid your foot hurts," he ventured propitiatingly.

"Not at all—I just pretend that it does," growled his father.

"I hoped you were better," said the son sincerely.

"Well, I'm not. What's that you got there?"

"A footstool—I thought it might make you more comfortable."

"Comfortable? How much do you want out of me now?" his father asked shrewdly.

"Why nothing, father," Rodney answered.

"Well, anyhow the answer is not a nickel!"

"Why do you say that?" Rodney quavered.

"I know you, and whatever it is you can't have it."

Rodney turned appealingly to Mary, who ignored him. He turned back to

"I'm coming, father. Coming," quaked Rodney.

his father again, and tried to muster up his courage to the sticking point.

"Well, as a matter of fact, I did want"— he began, clearing his throat.

"Oh, now we're getting to it," Martin retorted. "Well, what is it?"

"I wanted to have a talk with you—an important talk"—

"Curious! That's just what I wanted to have with you. I've wanted it all day, and now we'll have it. Miss Grayson!" he called to Mary.

"Yes, sir," said Mary meekly.

"Get out!"

She went without a glance at Rodney, who stood looking after her dejectedly, not knowing that his love's intention was to give him moral support by listening in the hall.

"Now, what do you mean by overdrawing your allowance again?" she heard Mr. Martin say when the door was closed.

"Why," innocently answered Rodney, "it simply proves that I was right when I told you my allowance was too small."

"What!" ejaculated his father, quite evidently upset.

"And if my allowance is too small for one it's much too small for two," the boy continued ingeniously.

"For two?"

"Father, has it ever occurred to you that I might marry?" inquired Rodney.

"Of course it has. You're fool enough for anything," growled his father.

"I don't consider a man a fool because he's married," said Rodney.

"That's because you've never tried it."

"I intend to try it, just the same," said Rodney.

"Oh, you do, do you? Who is the girl?"

"The girl?" repeated his son nervously.

"Yes, girl. You're not going to marry an automobile, or a polo pony, or an aeroplane, or any other of your idiotic amusements, are you? You're going to marry a girl, aren't you? Some blue eyed, doll faced, gurgling, fluttering little fool. Oh, why doesn't God give young men some sense about women?"

"I object very strongly to your speaking in that way of Miss Grayson," spoke up Rodney angrily.

"Miss Grayson? Miss Grayson—you're not going to marry a typewriter!"

"Yes, sir."

"Does she know it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Oh, of course she knows a good thing like you when she sees it"—

"I won't listen to you talk of Miss Grayson in that way"—

"You've got to listen. I won't permit any such absurd, ridiculous marriage. Thank heaven you had sense enough not to elope!"

"I wanted to, but she wouldn't. She insisted on your being told. So you see what an injustice"—

"Injustice! Can't you see she wanted me to know so that if I disapproved and cut you off she'd not be stuck with you on her hands?"

"Please, father"— pleaded Rodney and then dropped his hands at his sides and turned to go, adding, "It's quite useless."

"No, my boy; wait a minute," said Mr. Martin. "Remember I'm your friend, even if I am your father. Don't you believe it? It's only your money she wants."

"I know it isn't," replied Rodney proudly.

"I'll prove it is," said his father, pushing an enameled electric bell that stood near him on the table.

"What are you going to do?" cried Rodney nervously.

"Send for Miss Grayson," said his father grimly. "I'll tell that scheming secretary that if you persist in this marriage I'll disinherit you, and then you watch her throw you over," he amplified for Rodney's benefit.

"Even if you are my father you shan't insult the girl I love," protested Rodney hotly.

"Poppycock! You're afraid to put her to the test. You're afraid she will chuck you," retorted his father.

But Rodney answered quietly: "I'm not afraid, father. You're mistaken."

Johnson appeared meanwhile in answer to the bell and in a surprisingly short time and with a queer look on his usually imperturbable face, if they had only noticed it, returned with Mary Grayson under his escort. Mary looked from father to son with an elaborately assumed air of innocence and inquired:

"You wanted me, Mr. Martin?"

She saw Rodney out of the tail of her eye make a movement toward her and say "Mary" in a pleading tone; then heard his father interrupting him curtly. "My precious son," he told her, "has just informed me that you and he intend to get married. Is that right?"

CHAPTER IV.

The Bargain.

"OH, sir," Mary began timidly, almost losing her composure a moment, to think of the pass that things had come to with her connivance. She was not sure, moreover, if the soap king had not really been in earnest in his fulminations as they floated out to her in the hall. Either his acting or his gout must be genuine today, she began to fear.

"Because I wish to tell you," he began again, "that if he marries you he'll not get one penny of my money. And that means he'll starve. I suppose you realize that?"

Mary turned to Rodney, who was standing up very straight near the window looking on Fifth avenue, one hand catching the braided lapel of his coat as his eyes devoured her with such real love and confidence showing on his face that she could not resist his love's appeal to her. She turned to his father and answered him courageously:

"Then at least we'll starve together."

She was rewarded by the exultation in Rodney's voice as he exclaimed, "Mary!"

"You see, father," he added for the old gentleman's benefit.

"Making a grand stand play, eh," went on the soap magnate remorselessly to Mary, "before my idiot of a son. You think I'm so fond of him that I'll relent. Well, you're wrong. Neither of you will ever get a nickel out of me."

"We shan't starve," declared Rodney.

"Well, what can you do to keep from starving?" demanded his father. You're not a producer. You never will be. You're just an idler. You couldn't earn $5 a week. But you'll have a chance to try. You'll get out of my house tonight, or I'll have you thrown out."

"Now, father"—

"Not another word, sir, not another word!" cried his father and stamped out angrily into the hall.

Mary gave an involuntary sigh of relief.

"It's getting more like that play every minute," Rodney chuckled.

"Oh, Rodney, I'm so, so sorry," snivelled Mary.

"You were bully the way you stuck up for me," said her lover. "When

"Then at least we'll starve together."

you said we'd starve together I just choked all up."

"Please don't, Rodney," protested Mary, quite genuinely touched, and Rodney went on:

"Just because he's got a lot of money he seems to think there isn't any left for other people, but I'll show him I may not have much at the start, but watch my finish"—

"What are you going to do?" she asked him excitedly.

"I'm going to work."

"You are—really?"

"Yes, indeed. Father couldn't make me do it, but you can. I'll work for you."

"Oh, you are splendid!" Mary cried. "Shall you get a position?"

"I should say not! Work for some one else? No! I'm going in business for myself—for you. I'm going to show the stuff that's in me. Of course we can't get married till I've made good. Will you wait?"

"Yes, dear," said Mary shyly.

"You're a dandy!" cried Rodney, moving nearer to her.

"What business are you going into?" she asked.

"I don't know yet," said Rodney. "I'm going upstairs to pack a suit case and think. Wait here for me. I'll be back in fifteen minutes," he sang out, grabbing her and kissing her hastily, but heartily.

"Oh, oh—please"— protested Mary.

"Don't mind, Mary. I'll get you used to 'em," he called from the doorway.

She threw herself back on the Louis XV. sofa next the yellow typist's desk and waited, in a sudden reverie. The carved wooden rim of the sofa back just fitted a chink in her coiffure comfortably, and she lapsed into that curious state of introspection that comes sometimes with bodily and mental relaxation. What did she think of herself for what she'd done this evening? Was she any better than an adventuress? Was she not cajoling a young man into proposing to her for the love of money? Would Rodney's father really reward her as he had promised to do? Strangely enough it would not have seemed so bad, she felt, if she didn't like Rodney. Well, if the old man didn't pay, let him keep his money. She shouldn't care. It was something to have won a love like Rodney's love for her. There was something very lovable about Rodney Martin—

Woman's World

The Exquisite "Little Lady" Who Interprets Barrie's Plays.

MISS MAUDE ADAMS.

You have seen her—seen her from "the front," as they say in stageland—perhaps as a little lad in green breeches, with a charming, wistful face, in his right hand Pandean pipes and whom the members of his band called Peter Pan, or, perchance, as a gypsy girl with mischief in her eyes and rowan berries in her hair, yclept Lady Babbie, or, again, it may have been as one called Phoebe—Phoebe of the ringlets—whose home was in Quality street. Or was it as the patient Maggie Wylie trying—oh, so hard—to implant just one little spark or humor in the hopelessly humorless John Shand? Besides all these names and more which were thought out by a little man of Thrums and sent across the Atlantic to be made into very real people, she who created those characters so dear to playgoers has still another name.

It's Maude Adams.

Maude Adams and James Matthew Barrie—they are a unique and joyous combination. It scarcely seems that either could get along without the other. To interpret Barrie's subtle and delicious humor, with its ever present strain of tenderness, needs just such a winsome personality as the "little lady," as those who sit "in front" love to call her. And, without the Scotch playwright to build for her the most fascinating roles in the world, what, indeed, would Maude Adams do?

But, though it is Barrie who builds the roles and writes the whimsical dialogue of those who people his plays, it is Maude Adams who sees to it that [illegible] characters speak those lines and [illegible] things which make them fully [illegible] and quite as human as they [illegible] in the mind's eye of the man who conceived them. And this is not an easy task.

"It is my contemptible weakness," writes Barrie of himself, "that if I say a character smiled vacuously I must smile vacuously; if he frowns or leers, I frown or leer; if he is a coward or given to contortions, I cringe or twist my legs until I have to stop writing to undo the knot. I bow with him, eat with him and gnaw my mustache with him. If the character be a lady with an exquisite laugh I suddenly terrify you by laughing exquisitely. One reads of the astounding versatility of an actor who is stout and lean on the same evening, but what is he to the author who is a dozen persons within the hour? Morally, I fear, we deteriorate. But this is a subject I may wisely edge away from."

And so after Mr. Barrie has played his part as dramatist Miss Adams' work has but begun. How she sets about her task is best told by the director of her stage:

"When Miss Adams first receives a new play from Mr. Barrie she reads it over many times. She commits it to memory in its entirety. When this is accomplished she begins to visualize its characters from the most important to the most insignificant. Mentally she pictures first the segregated situations and then the entire action of the play. Her conception is always subject to subsequent changes, but, as a rule, she adheres to her original ideas. When she has mastered the play in the manner described the rehearsals are got under way. But these are conducted along lines quite different from the usual method pursued in stage work. Instead of dealing with the cast as a whole Miss Adams rehearses the principal characters individually. While this work is going on the minor characters are being taken care of by stage directors, who, for the sake of coherency, impersonate the more important, yet absent characters. Then comes the day when a complete rehearsal is called and the remarkable part of this performance is that every detail of action and every part of the action fits together as splendidly as though the complete cast had been working side by side for a month. And the satisfying result is that enthusiasm has not been dulled nor illusion dispelled by long and tiresome sessions where a more apt individual would often be made to wait upon one not so quick to perceive a given direction."

Care of Books.

To preserve books from becoming musty and possibly moldy in moist weather place a few drops of oil of lavender and Canadian balsam in a back corner of each shelf. This will not injure the bindings of leather books as sulphur compounds do, but helps to preserve the bindings.

Dollar Patriotism Derided.

In an editorial defense of the seamen's law the Los Angeles Tribune says:

"Ever since the enactment of the La Follette seamen's law a portion of the press has been shrieking that the statute will destroy our merchant marine and drive our flag from the seas. If that flag can be shown in alien waters only at the cost of the hideous injustices that were pepetuated upon seamen under its folds—if our merchant marine can be maintained only through national connivance with the heartless treatment accorded the sailors—then even the dire results the pessimists predict were preferably endured."

Steel Workers Get Raise.

A voluntary increase in wages which will average about 10 per cent has been granted the 17,000 employees of the Bethlehem Steel company. The increase went into effect Aug. 1. The monthly payroll of the local company is now about a million and a quarter. It is believed that the Bethlehem Steel corporation will take similar action with its subsidiary plants, the Union Iron works, San Francisco; Fore River shipyards, Quincy, Mass.; Harlan & Hollingsworth, Wilmington, Del., etc. The increase is expected to quiet whatever unrest among the workmen there may have been and also to attract skilled mechanics, some 2,000 more being needed.

Have a Purpose.

A life without a purpose is a languid, drifting thing. Every day we ought to renew our purpose, saying to ourselves, "This day let me take a sound beginning, for what I have hitherto done is naught."

Do You Believe These Things of Women?

An Editorial For Men

From the Empire State Campaign Committee

ANTI-SUFFRAGISTS tell you outright, and by the most obvious implication, that women are "looser" morally than men. Mrs. William Forse Scott, an anti leader of New York, proved it by citing statistics to show that more women than men are divorced for adultery. Anti-suffragist matter sent out to newspapers proves it by asserting that "in San Francisco questionable dance halls have increased since women have had the vote." The same insistence crops out in the statement that "the women of Nevada have just voted in favor of the six months divorce law."

DO YOU BELIEVE IT? Never mind the alleged facts. They are either distortions of the truth or blatant untruths. The point they seek to make is that women are morally looser than men. Do you believe it?

Anti-suffragists tell you, by the most obvious implication, that women are so little to be relied on to look after children's interests that it is safer to leave the privilege of voting about child welfare wholly in the hands of the men. "Child labor laws are better in male suffrage than in woman suffrage states." "Such laws are constantly improving without the women's vote." "In California, Washington and Oregon, where women vote, there is absolutely no restriction as to the hours children may work in canneries."

DO YOU BELIEVE IT? Has it been your experience that women are more or less interested in children than men are?

Anti-suffragists tell you, outright and by the most obvious implication, that if women are allowed political expression they will express themselves in all manner of anti-social ways and that sex license in particular will be their chief object in life.

DO YOU BELIEVE IT? Has it been your experience that it is the women of your community who seek and support sex license? Is it the women of your community who advocate the house of ill fame? Is the tendency to moral looseness markedly characteristic of the women of your home town?

Anti-suffragists tell you, by the most obvious implication—when there are no liquor people around to be influenced toward suffrage by the news—that woman suffrage means the wet state, the wet town. "No city of the size of Cambridge, Mass., has ever voted itself dry in any suffrage state."

DO YOU BELIEVE IT? Have you noticed that unrestricted liquor selling is in favor with the women you know? Is it your mother, your wife, your sister, who advocates low license, the cheap grog shop, the wide open town?

YOU KNOW YOU DON'T BELIEVE THESE THINGS OF WOMEN. If the antis do, how dare they subject men and children to the indirect influence of these woman monsters they picture—creatures whose base natures can be trusted only when restrained by law, creatures whose instincts predispose them toward the corner saloon, the house of prostitution and the inhuman drive of harsh industrial laws?

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

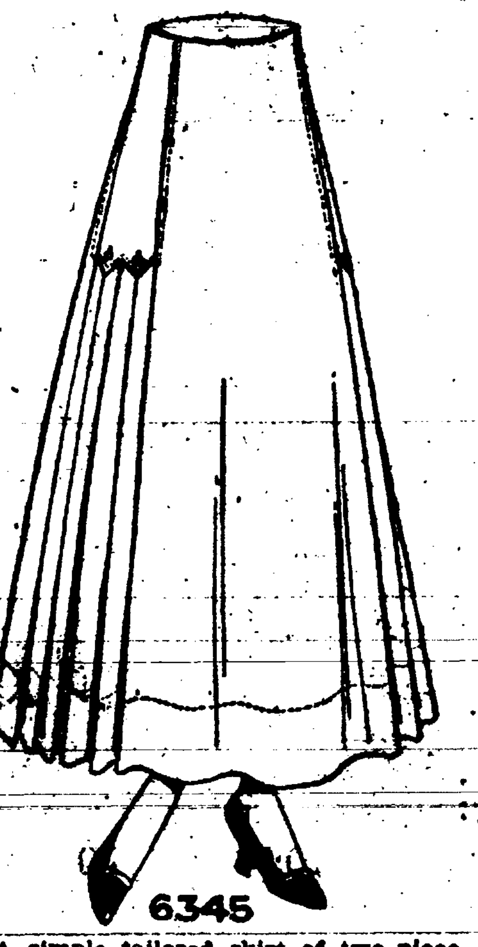
THE SMARTEST SKIRTS ARE SIMPLE IN LINE.



6345

A simple tailored skirt of two-piece design with pleated sides and a pointed hip section, for development in serge, whipcord or tweed.

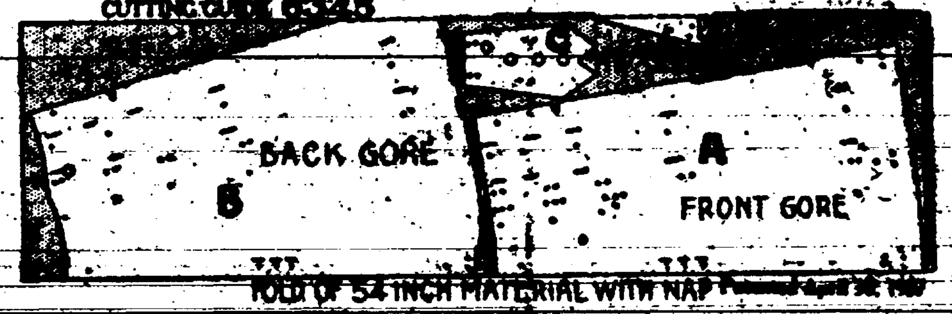
Although there is a great variety of separate skirt models among the new modes, simple effects predominate. Pleated effects are much in evidence, and in many designs these pleats are introduced at the side. For general wear serges, gabardines, whipcords, poplins, English and Scotch tweeds, checks, plaids and stripes are most used, with dark colors given the preference.

The design shown here is a two-piece skirt, with a pointed hip section. The closing is effected to the left of the center-front under the pleat. In medium size the model requires 2⅝ yards 54-inch material.

It is in the cutting that care must be exercised to preserve the lines of the skirt, as well as in the sewing. The front and back gores are placed on a lengthwise fold of the material, and if desired the perforations indicating the pleats can be followed on the goods with chalk, so that the pleats will be laid with mathematical precision.

The piecing for the gores is laid along the selvage edge of the goods, and to the right of the back gore, along a lengthwise thread, the hip section is placed. This, however, may be omitted, as it is an adjustable feature of the decoration. Its omission would leave the skirt finished with side pleats all the way up to the waist-line.

Belts are used extensively in connection with separate skirts and most of the new designs are of self material, although there is a great demand for belts of patent leather, suede, etc., in all widths. In simple tailored skirts the average width is from 1⅞ to 3 yards, the width depending to a considerable degree upon the material employed.



Pictorial Review Skirt No. 6345. Sizes 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist. Price, 15 cents.

Personality In Clothes

One could write a book of directions to women on what not to wear. The atrocities which some women put on their backs in the name of dress are almost too fearful to describe. The great trouble is that it is really impossible to give out any set rules on how to dress, for what one woman may wear with impunity another cannot appear in without secret and sometimes open ridicule. And the same suit which will be called smart on one girl will be characterized as dowdy on another.

Therefore no rigid rules for dressing can be given or should be followed. The selection of suitable clothes is more a matter of following one's personality or appearance than certain directions given out by others, no matter how great authorities they may be.

Girls who wish to look their best should never take the advice of outsiders, especially saleswomen, on what to wear. They should give careful, considerate study to their own appearance. Then when they enter a shop to buy they should try on different styles, discarding this, approving that, until the field narrows down to two or three particularly attractive models.

Never try to buy in a hurry, for you are almost certain to repent at leisure. Remember what you buy has to be worn for months and certainly deserves a few hours' careful consideration in the selection. Do not be a rigid devotee of Dame Fashion, for styles are as variable as woman's supposed moods, and where one may be very becoming another may be hideous. Usually there are enough different styles to afford room for a wide selection, so that if you search far enough you can generally find something to fit your type.

Color is another matter to be studied seriously by the girl who wishes to appear well dressed. It is much easier to decide what colors become you than to know what style is peculiarly your own. But even colors are sometimes confusing. For instance, it is a generally accepted fact that red rose and all the rich tones of this hue are particularly well suited to the brunette. The shade is undoubtedly becoming to most brunettes, but nevertheless should only be worn by the brunette of the dashing, vivacious or coquettish type. There are dark haired girls who come more under the head of quaint and demure. To them rose or red is a forbidden color, for there is nothing of the quaint or demure about either of these shades.

You must select your wardrobe with an eye not only to your appearance, but to your personality as well. And yet even here there may be confusion, for one often finds the tall, queenly woman who likes to be vivacious and the little, perky girl who would love to be stately. In such cases to fit their desired personalities would be extremely dangerous.

Then it is often easy to be dazzled by the color of a frock into overlooking its style. The saleswoman shows you a dress in a shade which you recognize at once as being most becoming to you. You try it on perhaps, and the shade brings out your good points to such an extent that you never notice the fact that the model accentuates your worst features. Such a mistake is very common unfortunately.

Dressing is not only an art; it is a study as well. You cannot watch your own type too carefully, and the woman who dresses well not only knows her own appearance by heart, but does not allow herself to be misled by colors, by fashion or by the words of the saleswoman.

The Well Groomed Woman.

This is distinctly a period of good grooming among women. The slovenly though perhaps artistic looking woman is no longer in the running. The woman who has the features of a Greek goddess and yet neglects to have her hair properly shampooed and dressed creates more adverse comment than the woman of irregular, even poor features who shows the good effect of careful grooming.

Good grooming is simply immaculate cleanliness and exquisite attention to details of the person, but in their anxiety to acquire this effect women are prone to adopt cosmetics or to employ means for reducing defects wherein the remedy is more undesirable than the defect itself. The wise woman is she who emphasizes all her good points so that they may outshine and distract from her defects. When a defect is so deep rooted as to require radical treatment it is far better for a woman to ignore its existence than to endanger her personal appearance, and perhaps her health, by trying to treat herself. If the defect is one which requires surgical treatment, go to an expert or endure the annoyance of the defect rather than risk what beauty you have by using an acid, the needle or electricity yourself.

Raspberry Sherbet.

Two quarts of raspberries, one cupful of sugar, one pint of water, the juice of a large lemon, tablespoonful of gelatin. Put the berries and sugar together, let them stand two hours, soak gelatin in cold water to cover, add one pint of the water to the berries and strain. Dissolve gelatin in half a pint of boiling water, add this to the strained mixture and freeze.

The Reason.

"The first year of married life is always the most troublesome. After a couple passes that safely the great danger of separation is over."

"Why do you say that?"

"It usually takes a man a year to learn the futility of arguing with his wife."—Detroit Free Press.

USES FOR TOMATOES.

RIPE Tomato Preserves.—Ripe tomatoes for preserving should have the skins removed by having them plunged for a few minutes into boiling water. Cover eight pounds of ripe fruit, cut in halves or in quarters, with seven pounds of granulated sugar, and set aside overnight. In the morning a sirup will be formed. Put this on to boil until it is clear, skimming off the foam which rises. This skimming is necessary in order to have a transparent sirup and must be done, of course, in all sugar sirups. Now put in the tomatoes and let them simmer for twenty minutes or so. Then drain them out and pack into jars which have been carefully sterilized. Then let the sirup continue to boil until it is rich and thick. Just before taking out add to the hot sirup the juice of three or four lemons, depending on the size of the lemons, the proportion being about one lemon to every two pounds of preserves. Don't add the rind. Now pour the sirup over the fruit in the jars and seal. Caps and covers, of course, should be sterilized as well as the jars.

Green Tomato Preserves.—Small, uniform sized green tomatoes make the best looking preserves for this, and they are most attractive when cooked without being either peeled or cut up. To eight pounds of fruit measured into the preserving kettle add seven pounds of sugar and a little cold water. If you don't want a preserve that is very sweet and very rich you may add water enough to cover. Add also three or four lemons cut in slices, peel and all, except seeds, and let the preserves boil gently for about three hours. An ounce of preserved ginger and a teaspoonful of ground mace may be added. This must not cook too fast; one must simmer it very gently. Pack in sterilized jars.

Tomatoes With Sauce.—Cut in rather thick slices without peeling, then roll them in flour and fry in butter, salting and peppering them as you fry. Turn with a griddle cake turner, and when both sides are done take out and lay on a hot platter. Now pour milk slowly on the flour left in the pan, stir continually to prevent lumps, brown and pour the sauce thus made over the tomatoes and serve.

DUTY OF UNIONISTS.

The principles of unionism must become the principles of the life of a true trade unionist, for they are founded upon fundamental concepts of justice. He must think unionism, feel it, live it, bring it into the lives of those with whom he works, for unionism is human welfare. He must read, study, talk, act, for the cause of unionism.

This is a question that must come home to the consciences of all those who labor. Are you doing your part?

Are you able to defend the cause of labor, to explain its principles, or do you avoid discussions because you have not prepared yourself to maintain your position?

Let each member of organized labor and every labor organization take up the intensive work of a labor-forward movement for America.—Samuel Gompers.

VIOLENT DEATHS.

One Indication Is the Immediate Setting In of Rigor Mortis.

More than once the question of whether a person has died a natural or unnatural death turns upon something grasped in the hand. The object is held because the hand stiffens through what is known as rigor mortis (pronounced rye-gor mor-tis), a stiffening of the muscles of the body after death.

Now, if a person dies naturally this stiffening of the muscles does not take place, as a rule, until two hours or more after death, and then it comes on slowly. In cases of violent death, however, rigor mortis sets in immediately. It is through this that many a murderer has been caught and many a so-called accidental death proved to be intentional.

One of the most remarkable effects of this sudden stiffening after death appears in the account of the charge of Balaclava. Captain Nolan while riding at the head of the noble six hundred had his chest torn open by a Russian shell.

The arm he was waving in the air at the moment remained high uplifted, and he retained his seat on his horse, which wheeled around and passed some distance through the ranks before the rider fell.

Portions of the hair and clothing of a murderer have often been found in the hands of the victim, while bodies recovered from the water have brought with them clutched in their fingers weeds and mud from the bottom, showing that death occurred in the water and not on land.—London Answers.

Natural Age of Man.

The question as to what is the natural age of man is by no means settled, of course, but many are of the opinion that the Frenchman Flourens was not far out of the way in his estimate of the time a man should live. Taking his observations from the group mammalia, of the class vertebrata, as having the closest resemblance to man and such species as are permitted to live the full term of their natural life under circumstances not admitting of error or doubt, Flourens found that their natural life extended to about five times the period of their lives from birth up to maturity. Applying the rule thus obtained to human life and taking the age at which the body is fully matured to be twenty years, he concluded the natural duration of the life of man to be 100 years.

Germans Moving Forward Into Great Battle for Railway

Advices from Petrograd, official and semi-official, say the Germans are sending enormous reinforcements into the district south of Riga, where they are moving along the roads between Vilna and Dvinsk. It is apparent now that the next big effort will be made in this sector, with the object of getting astride the Petrograd trunk line between these two cities.

The German columns have succeeded gradually in pushing their front eastward from Vilkomir across the Sventa, and their direct objective now seems to be Sventsyany, a junction point on the main line of railway. Great trains of siege and field artillery just from the shops have appeared in the vicinity of Volkomir, and these heavy pieces are being dispatched to the firing line as rapidly as the condition of the highways will permit. The larger number of the guns are being taken alony the Dvinsk road.

An extremely heavy engagement was in progress last night on a fifty mile front west and southwest of Dvinsk. The Germans have a strong hold on the west bank of the Dvina at Freichstadt, which will prevent any serious danger of outflanking, for the first time in four weeks they are in a position where they can undertake positive operations against Dvinsk with comparative safety to their wing.

While Field Marshall von Hindenburg is concentrating all his energies against the Dvinsk sector, however, General Ruszky, commanding the Russians, has been making equal preparations for a supreme test of his strength. He has taken advantage of every swollen stream with which the terrain abounds; he has heavily fortified every elevation, and he has brought his army up to a high state of efficiency, well armed and well supplied with ammunition. His line roughly runs from Jacobstadt through Ponemunok, Vishuny, Vidsenisicki and Shiviaty, an average distance of twenty-five miles west of the railway and a line drawn through Dvinsk.

The severity of the Austro-German reverses in Galicia is becoming more and more apparent. The Austrians have abandoned their positions along the middle Sereth and have fallen back fifteen miles, to the hills east of the Stripa, which they had crossed ten days ago. This was done, Vienna says, in the face of greatly reinforced Russian organizations. The Russian offensive has extended from Tarnopol south to the mouth of the Sereth, where they have recaptured Tlust.

In the center the Germans are continuing to press forward along the Plinsk railroad, but the operations east of Grodno are making little progress. Extremely stubborn Russian counter atacks are giving a seesaw character to thefi ghting.

A dispatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company from Amsterdam says:

"Emperor William has dismissed General von Klenge, commander of the Eighth division, who was held responsible for the Austro-German check by the Russians on the Sereth River, in East Galicia.

"General von Kluege, according to the German newspapers, retired from the service at his own request and with a pension."

POLICE BATTLE WITH DESPERADO

San Francisco, Sept. 13.—A six-hour battle between sixty police and George Nelson, twenty-five, wanted for the robbery last month of a Los Angeles bank, ended today when Nelson was found dead in his room. He had ended his life with a bullet shot into his head.

The police conducted the battle from a window in the home of Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, acrosst he st. from Nelson's home, and from other windows and housetops. A searchlight was placed in the window of another house.

Thousands watched the battle. Policeman Hammond was shot through the arms and legs, while Hugh Macbeth, who lived in the sameh ouse as Nelson, was probably fatally wounded.

At daybreak the police forced Nelson's door. He had been dead two hours. Three automatic pistols and a large quantity of ammunition lay near the body.

AUSTRIA WILL INSIST ON EQUALITY FOR JEWS

New York.—In reply to a letter from the Day, the national Jewis daily, respecting the views of the Austro-Hungarian government on the status of the Jews in the event of peace being declared between the European governments now at war, the following reply was received by the newspaper from the Austro-Hungarian Embassy:

"Although not especially authorized by my government to a statement in this regard, I am sure not to fail in expressing my opinion that at the occasion of the singning of a peace treaty with Russia Austria-Hungary will insist upon the assurance of equal rights for the Jews, not only in Poland—but all throughout Rusait."

MRS. GADALA DENIES MRS. OBODA'S CHARGE

Anna Gadala, arrested Saturday on a charge of assault by Sophie Oboda of Riverside avenue, asked for a jury trial when arraigned in City Court this morning before Judge Wilson. Mrs. Gadala was represented by James R. Somers, and W. S. Hillick is attorney for the camplainant. The case will be tried October 5.

According to information, Mrs. Oboda's parents had frequent rows with the Gadala family, and as Mrs. Oboda was walking down West 1st st. last Friday, Mrs. Gadala taunted her and then told her small son, John, to throw stones at Mrs. Oboda. John threw several stones with telling effect and Mrs. Oboda was severely bruised.

This morning, through an interpreter, Mrs. Gadala denied all knowledge of the incident and entered a plea of not guilty.

VISITORS HERE FROM JEFFERSON COUNTY

Two automobiles loaded with Theresa citizens arrived here Saturday to spend the week-end at the home of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Rappole in E. 5th st. The members of the party were: Mrs. C. J. Rappole and three daughters, and their husbands, Mr. and Mrs. A. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. J. Snell and Miss Marguerite Rappole; and Miss Helen Porter, who is a niece of Mr. and Mrs. Rappole.

The guests visited the State Fair today, returning here this afternoon. They will leave tomorrow for Theresa.

ST LOUIS UNCOVERS HUGE "ARSON TRUST"

St. Louis, Sept. 13.—Insurance agents, human "torches" and unnamed "prominent" business men comprise ar arson syndicate the police say they have uncovered here.

These incendiaries, the police say, were responsible for most of the big fires here five years ago and the profits of the syndicates ran into millions.

PATHFINDER BOAT CLUB TO PROLONG SEASON

The Pathfinder Boat Club, which was announced previously to close on Friday, will not close until the last week in September.

This morning it was announced that two more field days would be held, on the 17th and the 24th of this month. The members of the club who enjoyed the pleasures of the little pleasure spot are anxious to prolong the season as much as possible.

The annual dinner will be held at the club on September 21.

ENDEAVORERS TO HOLD COUNTY CONVENTION HERE

At the meeting of the Christian Endeavorers held in this city Friday evening, steps were taken to arrange for the county convention, to be held in the Baptist church, Friday, Sept. 24.

At that time Harold Waite, formerly of Canada, but now Field Secretary for this State, in place of H. L. Claussen of Binghamton, will be the principal speaker.

At Friday night's meeting Mrs. E. E. Hart and Miss Pearl Parke reported the result of the International C. E. convention held in Chicago, to which they had been elected as delegates.

Dante's Fierce Retort.

The secret of Dante's struggle through life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the Prince of Verona, who asked him how he could account for the fact that in the household of princes the court fool was in [illegible] favor than the philosopher.

"[illegible] of mind," said the fierce [illegible] all the world over the source of [illegible]."

"BIG TIM" LEFT MORE THAN MILLION

New York, Sept. 13.—William B. Ellison, receiver of the estate of "Big Tim" Sullivan, will file today in the Supreme Court a report showing the financial condition of the estate. According to the present estimate, the assets are more than $1,001,277.

Many claims have been filed against the estate, but only a few have been allowed. The heirs are Patrick H. Sullivan, brother; Lawrence Mulligan, half brother, and Mrs. Margaret Hickey, half sister. None of the relatives has received any money yet, but it is probable the share of each will be about $250,00 in the final distribution.

Since the death of Sullivan the business of Sullivan & Considine, a theatrical company, estimated to be worth $1,000,000, has been operated with success.

GREEN WILL FIGHT SHORT BALLOT PLAN

Binghamton, Sept. 13—State Excise Commissioner George E. Green will lead the fight of Whitman Repudlicans in the southern tier against the adoption of the new constitution.

His special objections are to the short ballot and the manner in which the questions are to be presented the voters.

IRISH TO RESIST CONSCRIPTION MOVE

New York, Sept. 13.—Secret Service men are investigating Irish organizations which are collecting funds to arm the Irish National Volunteers, it became known today. The Irish National Volunteer Fund Association has collected more than $40,000, which according to Dennis A. Sprellisy, of No. 246 Broadway, treasurer of the fund, has been sent to Ireland to buy riflesw ith which to resist conscription.

PROSPECTS OF INVOKING USE OF CHOPPING BLOCK INCURS DISPLEASURE OF FEW LEADERS

That the nomination of Victor C. Lewis for Mayor on the Republican ticket has caused an open breach in the ranks of the Republican organization became definitely known today shortly after the announcement that John Boland had filed his declination to run on the Democratic ticket. It is also understood that the influence of some of the strongest members of the Republican organization will now be used in furthering the candidacy of M. E. Mead, who will probably receive the endorsement of the Democratic committee today, and for James Brooks, the candidate of the Prohibition and Independent parties, who is also spoken of as a possible Democratic choice.

As forecasted in The Times of last evening Mr. Boland's declination, prepared Saturday, was filed in Oswego yesterday. Close friends of the former Mayor say he was urged repeatedly to run, not only by members of his own party, but by prominent Republican politicians, who are willing to go to any lengths to beat Mr. Lewis. Mr. Boland, however, refused to listen to their appeals and says he is out of politics locally for all time.

Friends of Mr. Lewis admit that he was not the unanimous choice of the Republican organization here, and say their candidate incurred the displeasure of some of the leaders by his remarks regarding his appointments should he be elected. Mr. Lewis, it is understood, will practically "clean house" at the City Hall and all the present members of the official family will receive their walking papers. It is definitely known that Mr. Lewis is not in accord with the present policy of the city attorney's office and has already plainly stated that he will remove the present incumbent if elected. The friends of Mr. Fanning know this, and are ready to work their hardest to beat Mr. Lewis on this point alone. The appointments on the Board of Public Works, which will be the prize of the next administration, are also contrary to the wishes of the organization leaders, and for that reason John W. Stevenson, president of the board at present, will not support Mr. Lewis and would not accept him as a candidate in the committee conference.

This fact, it is understood, has resulted in Mr. Stevenson changing his attitude toward Commission Government, and now he is disinterested.

The refusal of the leaders to support Mr. Lewis, as well as the knowledge that his appointments will displace many of the present officeholders who looked for re-appointment if Mayor Fox or any other candidate acceptable to the party leaders was elected, has resulted in the defection of several staunch party men.

On the other hand, Mr. Lewis' friends feel that his intentions with regard to the appointments will earn him the commendation and support of many voters who are heartily tired of the machinery and methods of the present organization and administration.

Anderson Declares Effort to Remove Politics Liquor Question and Get Down to Educational Work.

To the Editor:

You will find below the essential part of the letter of the Anti-Saloon League is sending to all legislative candidates in advance of the primary.

Will you not join us in the effort to eliminate the liquor question from politics by calling attention to the fact that our queries expressly avoid the question of prohibition or license and confine the assembly campaign issue to the naked questions of self-government. The newspapers of the State of New York have it in their power to get rid of the liquor question as a disturbing factor by backing up the Anti-Saloon League in its effort to have it referred directly to the people. Then the Anti-Saloon League will get out of politics and devote its attention to educational work in the various communities which can settle the license question free from any political complications.

Yours respectfully,
WILLIAM H. ANDERSON,
State Superintendent.
New York, Sept. 13, 1915.

Letter to Assembly Candidates.

We do not ask you whether you are in favor of prohibition. We make no inquiry into your habits as respects the use of alcoholic liquor. The question of whether you are a total abstainer is outside of our province. Whether you are for license or no-license locally is not material to the issue here involved. All that we are concerned about in this matter is whether you stand for ALLOWING THE PEOPLE TO VOTE. You might consistently favor a measure which hands the liquor question for decision back to the people of the various communities which can settle home and fight against your own community voting out saloons under it. We recognize that the people have no right to force THEIR views upon YOU any more than YOU have a right to force YOUR views upon THEM.

It would be manifestly unreasonable to ask a legislative candidate to make a pledge offhand, in advance, covering the details of an intricate administrative question. He is entitled to time to think and opportunity for conference. But every man knows at once what he believes on the naked issue of whether his constituents generally, or the saloon keepers and brewers are to settle the liquor question in his district. He is either for or against maojrity rule. Further, after making all possible effort to amend it constructively into harmony with his personal views, elementary good faith requires that any man who declares for a principle shall support the measure toward that end which is desired by the majority of those who want that sort of thing. Still further, it is obvious that a pledge in favor of a principle or a measure is not only useless but may even amount to bad faith if the one who makes it then joins with the enemies of such principle or measure to prevent the subject coming to a vote at all.

We are not asking you to make any pledge to the Anti-Saloon League as a special interest, but simply that you shall make a frank public statement upon a public question, and in behalf of that large and respectable portion of your constituency which the league represents, we ask the following

STYLE WEEK COMING; CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PLANS ATTRACTIONS

The Retail Trade Committee of the Chamber of Commerce has decided upon the dates for the Fall Opening Week this month, at which time all the larger local stores will display fall styles with special features to attract the inspection of the purchasing public. September 28 the opening will begin, and on that evening, Tuesday, the stores will remain open so that the shoppers may have an opportunity to review the latest modes and fashions of the fall season. Some of the stores have arranged for music and souvenirs for this date. The opening will continue on Wednesday and Thursday, September 29 and 30. The merchants will exploit the event with a concerted advertising campaign, not only in the rural districts.

COUNT TO ASK BERLIN FOR DISAVOWAL OF ATTACK

Washington, D. C., Sept. 14.—The bombardment with official notes, which has been the chief feature of the conduct of the submarine issue by both Germany and the United States, and which now is realized to have worked unnecessary and serious injury to the delicate situation existing between the two governments, is to stop.

It was agreed that the task of obtaining from Berlin those assuracnes of good faith which the United States demands should be intrusted to Count von Bernstorff and that he is not to be embarrassed by public exchanges of notes.

Count Bernstorff seemed to be optimistic today after his talk with Mr. Lansing over hisc hance for success in obtaining from Berlin those assurances and proofs of good faith and sincerity that the United States wants.

Of course, from the American viewpoint, Berlin will have to act to justify this optimism of the German Ambassador before it can be said that the situation has improved.

There has been no actual improvement in the situation.

Matters are not at a deadlock, nor was there any crisis before Count von Bernstorff arrived here. The situation was menacing by reason of the fact that the United States felt it required a demonstration of good faith from Germany. It will remain menacing utnil that is received.

The Ambassador's optimism really does not justify any assertion that there has been an improvement in the situation.

There was made available to the Ambassador the evidence which the United States has obtained with regard to the circumstances sur-

BIG TIME COMING TO AUTO CLUB M[illegible]BERS AT SOUTH [illegible]Y CLUB

An outing at South Bay, a dinner at t[illegible]h Bay Clubhouse plenty of good band music and a long list o[illegible]tive field sports—These and more things are in store for every member of the Fulton Automobile Club who agrees to attend the run to that favorite resort on September 24, according to the advices received yesterday by F. H. Morin, secretary of the local organization. Mr. Morin's information came in the nature of a communication signed by the Syracuse Automobile Club and the notice is one of a number sent out to autoists in Utica, Cortland, Auburn, Oswego, Geneva, Ithaca, etc.

Baseball is to receive a lot of attention at the outing, and it is not an improbability that several of the local fans, who are also auto fans, may try for honors on the diamond—just to show that they are not has-beens in the national game.

As is well known, there is a beautiful grove at South Bay wherein one may ramble at will, or where families may take basket of lunch and eat in all the privacy and seclusion desired. The use of this grove entails no expense, a fact that will appeal to persons who want to make the run but who do not feel they can afford to dig up the price of a dinner at the clubhouse. The clubhouse dinner will be served at 1:30 o'clock and to make sure of being seated those who expect to make the run should communicate at once with Mr. Morin that he may make table reservations immediately.

ARMORED AEROPLANES WILL GUARD LONDON; BUILT HERE

New York, Sept. 14.—A fleet of 10,000 armored aeroplanes, equipped with machine guns, searchlights and a newly perfected bomb dropping device is being hurried to completio nin this country, Canada and elewhere for use by the British government in protecting London and the English coast from further attacks by Zeppelin dirgibles, it was learned yesterday.

Great Britain already has a fleet of 2,000 aeroplanes of various types and speed, but she is constructing here, in Canada and in England the mighteiest fleet of aerial war craft in exisetence, it was said, and already the first flotilla of twenty aeroplanes, of which the giant, America, built to cross the Atlantic Ocean, was the forerunner, are in operation.

The warplane Canada, constructed by the Curtiss Aeroplane and Motor Company at Toronto, Canada, Canada, is on her way to

OFFICER SWEET REFUSES BRIBE

Arrested Man Whose Stock of Long Green Made Court Spectators Gasp for Breath.

Patrolman Sweet arrested Mike Futrick and Steve Socreck last night on East First st., South, while both men were parading through that thoroughfare, far gone in intoxication. Steve and Mike didn't realize what was happening until they landed at the door of the City Hall, but when Steve finally grasped the situation he begged the officer to let him go home.

The officer calmly opened the door of the jail and told the men to go in. Steve stopped, took from his pocket his purse, and peeling off a $20 bill, said to the officer, "You take this—I go home." The officer laughed and told the men to go in and rest a while, whereupon Steve took out five $20 bills, put them in the officer's hands, and then started to walk away, saying, "You keep them, that's all right." Sweet locked both men up before Steve had a chance to dig up any more money.

When they were arraigned this morning Futrick's wife was in court and after Judge Wilson had fined both men $5 each, she walked up and handed her husband the money for the fine. Steve demurred a little at paying the fine, telling the Judge he was sick and only took two drinks of medicine, so that he was not intoxicated when the officer arrested him. Chief Dyer finally brought Steve's roll from the police safe, and when he told the court the man had $128 in his pocketbook, several spectators required first aid. Socareck told Judge Wilson he intended to send the money to some relatives of his in Russia who live in the war zone and are hard pressed for necessities. He finally parted with $5 and was allowed to go.

COMRADES FELL OUT; LANDED IN JAIL

Floyd Gregory of Granby and Jesse Beeman of Dexterville came to town yesterday to trade horses. They imbibed freely and when they met on Hannibal st. late in the evening at the rendezvous of the local horse-traders, Gregory decided that Beeman was his mortal enemy, at about the time that Beeman came to the conclusion Gregory annoyed him.

The horse traders formed a ring, and each man was doing his best to put the other down for the count, when Officer Bray appeared.

This morning both pugilists were penitent, and after they had listened to a stern lecture on the evils of intemperance they paid fines of $10 each.

EVOLUTION IN FARMING

Some difference of opinion may reasonably exist with reference to the gradual disappearance of the farm-owning class and the increase in the tenant class. In Illinois, for instance, we are told that in 1890 the farms operated by the owners numbered 158,848, and in 1910 the number was 145,767. The figures relating to tenants are, in 1890, 81,883, while in 1910 the number was 104,379.

An unidentified commentator referring to this condition, says: "In all countries and in all historic times the existence of a class of independent farmers living on their own lands has been counted a great source of national strength. The appearance of tenants has, in contrast, been a witness to the effects of economic forces hostile to democratic institutions."

It is too much to expect that agricultural conditions will remain unchanged in an age which is witnessing a revolution in almost every form of activity. When men come to realize how profitable agriculture is, conducted as a business venture on business principles, very likely there will be still fewer farmers and more tenants, so-called. A man of enterprising habits and capital can with a stated force of laborers farm 2,000 acres profitably when the same force could not, separately, farm half that number of acres. The difference would be in team work, up-to-date farm machinery and an organized system of conducting the enterprise. This result is hardly a menace to democratic institutions, though it does threaten that old-fashioned, go-easy system familiar through two or three generations of practice among us.—Rochester Herald.

COMMUNITY SINGING

When it comes to "community spirit,—employing a much abused term—there is no town in northern New York more freely blessed than Potsdam. The people there are alive to every opportunity for community advancement. While the village has been known as the Athens of northern New York, there are indications that it will also assume the comparison with some live western city that is always urging its claims to being alive in telling the people that "Denver did it," or asking them to 'keep an eye on Seattle."

The latest claim of Potsdam to especial notice is the community singing idea as carried out at the fair this week. They employed a community chorus man, he led the singing in front of the grandstand and as he raised his stick melody broke forth that ascended to the hills of Pierrepont and rolled through the valleys of Hopkinton. They sang the old songs, "Silver Threads Among the Gold," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," and "America," and they sang in a hearty way that added to the enjoyment of every one at the fair.

Persons who attended Potsdam's fair declare that it was theb est one in years and that this singing feature was responsible in no small degree for its success. Everyone likes to try to sing, no matter what his abilities. Potsdam will carry out the public chorus idea another year. Other fairs of northern New York might profit by the success of the Athens experiment. —Watertown Times.

"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

Immediately after that sentence was pronounced, Adam got himself a job and the world began advancing. It has never stopped advancing. Four hundred American cities have advanced by adopting Commission Government. Adam started the ball rolling.

So long as men work, the world will roll further and further ahead. So long as men work for the advancement of good clean city government, economy will be furthered.

When men quit work, the world—and this city—will cease being worth the living in. In the sweat of our faces must we eat our bread to find it sweet. The people of this city have for years worked, but has the city advanced in proportion to the labor performed? The property owner has for years worked to pay the taxes demanded of him, and he is eating his bread in the sweat of other faces. The renter of houses who has to pay the high rent demanded of him by the persons who have kept and still keep rolling the ball along.

Is it not time to find some of the sweetness of the bread? It can be found in the administration of public business upon a business basis. Only three days remain for rolling the ball along. The time to get behind the old ball is now, if ever, and give a long push, a strong push and a push all together for a city government that is not run for the favored few and their friends.

Genius is the only power of making continuous efforts. The line between failure and success is so fine that we scarcely know when we pass it; so fine that we are often on the line and do not know it. How many a man has thrown up his hands at a time when a little more effort, a little more patience, would have achieved success. As the tide goes clear out, so it comes clear in. In business, sometimes, prospects may seem darkest when really they are on the turn. A little more persistence, a little more effort, and what seemed hopeless failure may turn to glorious success. There is no failure except in no longer trying. There is no defeat except from within, no really insurmountable barrier save our own inherent weakness of purpose.—The Fra.

THEORY HAS LIMITATIONS

Perhaps the opponent of Commission-Manager plan is telling you that the man next door is as fit to direct the expenditure of the taxpayers' money and the business of the city as any man who may be selected by the voters under the improved form of city government, but how many of us are properly qualified to discharge the duties of an alderman as a good business man would define it? We advocate economy and efficiency in the conduct of public business, but how many of us are fitted by knowledge to sit in judgment of a piece of engineering skill, or a matter of educational importance? From the doubt as to whether a city attorney is correctly giving the law and the evidence bearing upon the controversies between the city and a contestant, we have a hundred questions to decide, each of which must be decided rightly to give us the good government proposed by the people.

Under our present form of government each of us has his private business which demands his whole time and needs his best thought. We leave to inexperienced heads and hands the conduct of a big business—the people's business—the city's business. What is the result? A tax rate of $3.54 on every $100 of your assessment, and a bonded indebtedness of $612,651.75.

Theoretically the present form of city government sounds well, but does it work well? You must judge—and then vote in line with your judgment on Friday, September 17.

YOU MAY NOT KNOW IT, BUT PIGS DISLIKE ART.

The fact that pigs are lacking in almost all the finer sensibilities, are unappreciative, clumsy and selfish to a degree, again has been proved in Cairo, N. Y., by the action of Ferdinand Le Marquis, 3d, a pig belonging to Silas Finch. This unspeakable pen ornament has aroused the indignation of every summer boarder in the hamlet by an offense against art, civilization and friendship.

Among the persons stopping at the Finch farm is Michael Pelletier, of New York City, a landscape painter, whose work has attracted the interest of every one in town. Mr. Pelletier has been working for some weeks at a point on the road leading from the Finch homestead into Cairo, and the work, having developed to a stage of semi-completion, has been heralded as one of the best things that the young artist has ever done during a summer stay. So great was the local interest in the picture that Mr. Pelletier had consented, at the request of some of the leading townspeople, to show the work, when completed, in a centrally located store.

Ever since Mr. Pelletier has been working on the painting Ferdinand Le Marquis, 3d, has been shouting around near the easel and grunting in friendly fashion. Mr. Pelletier was amused by his actions, and despite the fact that well informed persons assured him that Ferd was up to no good, the artist allowed him to stand about and be, to a certain extent, one of the party.

Yesterday afternoon when Mr. Pelletier was at work a long distance call from New York was received for him and Mr. Finch called to him. He hurried from the easel, leaving Ferdinand Le Marquis, 3d, standing innocently near it. When he returned in ten minutes the easel was empty and the pig was eating the last atom of a ray of sunlight.

The whole town is aroused.

Difference Between Amusing and Convincing

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

AN ADVERTISER must realize that there is a vast difference between amusing people and convincing them. It does not pay to be "smart" at the line rate of the average first-class paper. I suppose that I could draw the attention of everybody on the street by painting half of my face red and donning a suit of motley. I might have a sincere purpose in wishing to attract the crowd, but I would be deluding myself if I mistook the nature of their attention.

The new advertiser is especially prone to misjudge between amusing and convincing copy. A humorous picture may catch the eye of every reader, but it won't pay as well as an illustration of some piece of merchandise which will strike the eye of every buyer. Merchants secure varying results from the same advertising space. The publisher delivers to each the same quality of readers, but the advertiser who plants flippancy in the minds of the community won't attain the benefit that is secured by the merchant who imprints clinching arguments there.

Always remember that the advertising sections of newspapers are no different than farming lands. And it is as preposterous to hold the publisher responsible for the outcome of unintelligent copy as it would be unjust to blame the soil for bad seed and poor culture. Every advertiser gets exactly the same number of readers from a publisher and the same readers—after that it's up to him—the results fluctuate in accordance with the intelligence and the pulling power of the copy which is inserted.

DR. FINEGAN URGES COMMUNITY SCHOOL

Nunda, Sept. 14.—Dr. Finegan, assistant state commissioner of education, spoke from the platform in the public square on Saturday, the last day of the fair. Dr. Finegan strongly advocated a community school for Nunda and vicinity. He pointed out the advance which has been made on the farms and in the farming communities during the past twenty or thirty years.

He declared that the immense sums of money expended by the state for state roads should directly benefit the farmers in the way of transporting their children to a first-class school as well as transporting their produce to market. He said that the educational advantages for country children should equal those of the city children, and that this should be accomplished by uniting in one strong school.

3,000 WOMEN ATTEND VOTERS' CONVENTION

San Francisco, Sept. 14.—Many of the 3,000 women expected to assemble today from all parts of the country for the first woman voters' convention are here. The convention, which will be under the auspices of the Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage, will be presided over by Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, of New York.

Among the women prominent in the national woman suffrage movement who are here are Mrs. Margaret Remington Charter, the English militant; Mrs. John J. White, Washington, D. C.; and Miss Alice Paul, the chairman of the Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage.

FLOOD LOSS $75,000 IN NEIGHBORING COUNTY

Syracuse, Sept. 14.—Torrential rains which continued all Sunday night and at intervals yesterday, caused damage in Onondaga county estimated at $75,000. Little creeks were transformed into rivers which flooded the lowlands, carrying away bridges and dams. Railroads and interurban tracks were washed away and many industries, especially in the Otisco valley, sustained considerable damage from water. At Weedsport the Erie canal overflowed its banks. Cellars in village stores were flooded. The storm was accompanied by a severe electrical disturbance.

BARREL PRICE OF OIL GOES UP 5 CENTS

Pittsburgh, Sept. 14.—Five cents a barrel was added to the price of the principal grades of crude oil yesterday, the South Pennsylvania Oil company announcing these prices: Pennsylvania, $1.65; other prices quoted ..heavy aand..ed-.taoinenanonann are Mercer black and Newcastle, $1.23; Cabell, $1.25; Corning, $1.12; Somerset, $1.08, and Ragland unchanged at 65 cents.

PHYSICIANS SIDE WITH WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE

Rochester, Sept. 14.—Ninety-eight of one hundred of the men who attended the International Health Conference in Rochester last week are in favor of votes for women. That is the report of Jane Thompson, "voter, from Chicago," who is in Rochester helping in the suffragists' campaign. Miss Thompson herself interviewed a hundred of the men, most of them physicians, who came to town for the conference, and says she found only two opposed to equal suffrage. The expressions of opinion that followed were gathered by her.

Dr. W. C. Woodward, Washington, D. C., former president of the American Public Health Association: "The success of public health work in any community is in proportion to the extent of interest that the women of that community take in it." To the question, "Do you think that having the ballot would add to this interest?" his reply was, "The greater the civic responsibility, the greater civic interest is bound to follow."

Dr. E. H. Reede, of Washington, D. C., said he was unqualifiedly in favor of equal suffrage. He has lived in Colorado and to the Colorado women's vote he ascribes the good health inspection and conditions that exist in Colorado's public schools. "All of us men in public health work feel that the women's vote would help," Dr. Reede continued. "The recommendations from the doctor always to the mother. In the medical inspection of schools all over the country with the mother's vote back of the election of public officials, it would be most efficacious.

RUSSIA CLOSES DEAL FOR MUNITIONS HERE

New York, Sept. 14.—Negotiations for the purchase by the Russian government from the Canadian Car & Foundry Company of 3,000,000 shrapnel and high explosive shells at a cost of $52,000,000 have been virtually completed, it was stated at the local offices of the company today.

Part of the work will be sublet to munition concerns in this country, it was said, and in the case of previous war orders received by the Canadian company.

Dante's Fierce Retort.

The secret of Dante's struggle through life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the Prince of Verona, who asked him how he could account for the fact that in the household of princes the court fool was in greater favor than the philosopher.

"Similarity of mind," said the fierce genius, "is all the world over the source of friendship."

USES MULE TO LOCATE OIL.

Colonel Green Has Novel Method of Finding Spot For New Wells.

Colonel E. H. R. Green of New York and Dallas, son of Mrs. Hetty Green, firmly believes that there is nothing like a mule for locating a new oil field.

The other day Colonel Green and a party of Dallas men associated with him in an oil venture went out to locate a site for the first well. He selected a mule as master of ceremonies. The mule was driven into the field and allowed to take his own time in coming to a stop.

Where the mule first started to graze a stake was driven and plans begun for the erection of the first derrick. If oil is struck the mule will be placed on a pension.

Strike Guards Held.

Ten of the 129 guards of the Standard and Tide Water Oil companies in the recent strike in Bayonne, N. J., who were arrested by order of Sheriff Eugene F. Kinkead, were held for the Hudson county grand jury by Recorder William F. Cain, sitting in Jersey City. Each was charged with inciting to riot, but it is probable that the grand jury will consider other charges against them. Four men have died of wounds inflicted in strike riots, and many are suffering injuries.

Is It Worth While?

Is it worth while that we jostle a brother
Bearing his load on the rough road of life?
Is it worth while that we jest at each other
In blackness of heart—that we war to the knife?
God pity us in our pitiful strife.

God pity us all as we jostle each other;
God pardon us all for the triumphs we feel
When a fellow goes down; poor heart-broken brother,
Pierced to the heart; words are keener than steel,
And mightier far for woe or for weal.

Were it not well in this brief little journey,
On over the isthmus, down into the tide,
That we give him a fish instead of a serpent
Ere folding the hands to be and abide
For ever and aye in dust at his side.

Look at the roses saluting each other;
Look at the herds all at peace on the plain,
Man, and man only, makes war on his brother,
And dotes in his heart on his peril and pain—
Shamed by the brutes that go down on the plain.

—Joaquin Miller.

Home Town Helps

TO STUDY CITY PROBLEMS

Chicago Organization Has Comprehensive Scheme for the Improvement of Western Metropolis.

The modern city is a haphazard conglomeration of private and public institutions, according to the City club of Chicago. It suffers from a want of healthy neighborhood life. The efficiency of many public institutions, such as charity stations, social settlements and the like, is greatly impaired by the thoughtless manner in which they are distributed.

The club announces, therefore, a competition for plans for a neighborhood center. The plans are designed to show "the practical possibilities of enhancing neighborhood life in our cities by proper grouping of buildings and grounds for neighborhood activities." The ideal city, according to the promoters of this competition, is a federation of such properly planned neighborhoods.

Any study of housing conditions in our industrial cities should be welcomed. Inefficient housing is at the root of a great many distressing situations which for want of a better word must be designated as "social problems." The work of the City club in the direction of finding practical and graphic suggestions for better city planning may be made to hold great benefit if the plans decided upon are brought to the attention of the public and are made the opening wedge for a vigorous campaign for better city building.

We have had so many commissions in recent years "studying," "investigating," reporting and resolving on all manner of matters that are wrong with us. It is to be hoped the City club competition will be more than just another, destined to dust and desuetude.—Chicago Tribune.

PLANT FLOWERS AND SHRUBS

Easy to Beautify Streets if Entire Community is of One Mind in the Matter.

I visited Europe last summer and had occasion to travel a great deal in different parts, but nowhere could I see a small city like that of Strassburg, Alsace, writes a correspondent of the Chicago Daily News. There, wherever one looks, one sees the Boston ivy growing up along fences and around trees. The street called Ruprechtsauern Alle is simply a park, as all places along this street have their flower boxes and gardens in front of the house and Boston ivy all along their fences.

It is so easy to cultivate flowers and shrubs, including the Boston ivy, as just a little time and patience is needed, mornings and nights. Where one has the good fortune to have running water, it should be a pleasure and comfort, compared to us in the country, where we must pump all our water by hand in order to keep up our flower garden.

Another thing in the cultivation of flowers is a beautiful rose garden, where one can have roses all summer, as they are also easy to raise and care for. Just a little common sense is required in feeding them well from the start and using a good insect powder to keep off the green lice.

It ought to be a pleasure for people who live in a house or flat to keep their yards and windows cultivated, in not alone growing flowers but all kinds of vegetables for their kitchens.

Good Use of Ficus Repens.

It is often necessary to erect retaining and other walls of cement where their use is strictly utilitarian and in no wise adding to the embellishment of garden and grounds. To hide the face without obliterating the form of such walls is one of the missions of Ficus repens, and splendidly is it designed and equipped for the purpose. Then, too, an excess of cement wall and walk is monotonous, and during summer this noticeably raises the local temperature. This in turn may be considerably modified by covering excess areas of cement with this closely-mantling evergreen vine.

Best Place for Babies.

Miss Julia C. Lathrop, chief of the children's bureau at Washington, says that the United States could learn much from New Zealand in the way of saving babies. New Zealand has an infant mortality rate which is lower than that of any other country and which is but half the size of the estimated American rate. The New Zealand Society for the Health of Women and Children has had much to do in preserving the health of babies. The society was founded in 1907 for the purpose of extending a health mission which had been started by the medical superintendent in one of the hospitals of a large city.

Australia's Record Wool Exports.

The wool exports from Australia for ten months of the season showed an increase of over 300,000 bales, compared with the figures for the corresponding period of the previous season. Queensland alone showed an increase of 80,000 bales.

WHAT A MAN READS.

It is a Big Factor in Determining His Course of Life.

A certain low form of aquatic animal life anchors itself to a rock and feeds on whatever the current brings. The average man feeds his mind in much the same way. He falls into line for current amusements. He reads only current literature. He listens to what happens to go by. He makes but little systematic attempt to shut out the unfit or to put himself in line for the fit.

The result is a defective grade of human life that rarely elevates society and often degrades it. If a man would make the most of himself, and that is manifestly the supreme purpose for which he was put into the world, it is worth his while to do his daily work where unclean things, mental and physical, are not made common.

It makes a good deal of difference in the worth of the man today as to whether his reading last night was "Hamlet" and "Isaiah" or "The Other Man's Wife," whether he went to the art institute or the burlesque show. An ancient teacher of well balanced mind gave this direction to his disciples as to the topics to be selected for deliberate thought:

"Finally, my brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things."

To think on these things one must see and hear these things. To see and hear these things one must make an effort to do so.—Minneapolis Journal.

Sunlight and Vegetation.

The early rays of the sun exercise a more powerful effect in promoting rapid vegetation than the sun's light during the later hours of the day. The active little chlorophyll grains work faster and better in elaborating food for the plant under the action of the blue and yellow rays of the early morning than under the later violet and blue rays. Practical gardeners should make use of this fact by growing early produce as far as possible in a position where the plants will get the full benefit of the morning sun.—London Mail.

EXILE IN ARCTIC PRISON.

"Grandmother of Russian Revolution" is Given a Transfer.

Mme. Catherine Breshkovskaya, known the world over eight years ago as "the grandmother of the Russian revolution," now serving a life exile in Siberia, has been transferred to the far northern city of Yakutsk, on the edge of the arctic circle, according to a letter received from her by Miss Alice Stone Blackwell.

Mme. Breshkovskaya is seventy-one years old and is suffering from cataracts of both eyes, so that she cannot read. Her banishment to Yakutsk, least desirable of all towns in Siberia, came at the end of eighteen months' solitary imprisonment at Irkutsk for trying to escape from Siberia, where she had been sent for life. She served two additional months in prison, the letter says, because no caravan was to start for Yakutsk when her term ended.

About ten years ago Mme. Breshkovskaya came to America and made many friends in this country, among them Miss Jane Addams and Julia Ward Howe. After her return to Russia she was arrested, found guilty of distributing arms and sentenced to life exile.

CHINA'S PRESIDENT MAY WEAR CROWN

Yuan Shih Kai Thinking of Proclaiming Himself Emperor.

GOODNOW INDORSES PLAN.

American Who Is Legal Adviser to the Government Cites Reasons Why It Is Better to Have a Monarchy In That Country—Nation Became a Republic In 1912—News Creates Sensation.

The project of proclaiming himself emperor is now being discussed by Yuan Shih Kai, president of the Chinese republic, with his immediate supporters and Professor Frank Johnson Goodnow of Johns Hopkins university, legal adviser to the Chinese government, who is spending the summer in Peking.

Professor Goodnow, who secured the confidence of Yuan Shih Kai by advice given during former critical times, has been consulted on this question since his arrival in Peking not long ago, and it is learned that he approves the project.

Says Conditions Differ.

The news became public by the publication of accounts of the formation by several prominent men of an association for the purpose of discussing whether a monarchy is not the better form of government for China. The published article telling of the formation of the society quotes Professor Goodnow as declaring that for China a monarchy is a better form of government than a republic and that "conditions are different in China and America, and it is impossible to transplant a system from one country to another."

It was learned from one of Yuan Shih Kai's immediate supporters that if the project proved feasible the plan is to establish the monarchy within two years.

Goodnow Invited to Peking.

It is stated that Professor Goodnow was asked to come to Peking and that soon after his arrival Yuan Shih Kai consulted with him on the question of a permanent constitution and broached the question of a monarchy. The arguments of Yuan's supporters, it is declared, persuaded Professor Goodnow that a monarchy should be established if the people would accept it, and Professor Goodnow drafted a document for Yuan, advising him on the method of establishing a monarchy.

In the announcement of the project, which is made to appear as coming from a group of leading citizens, Professor Goodnow is quoted extensively as a great authority advocating the necessity for a monarchy. This pronouncement says:

"As Professor Goodnow is a citizen of a republic, he is more competent to make such a statement than others."

Professor Goodnow said he had made no blanket statement that a monarchy was better than a republic, but said that under certain conditions such as apply in China he believes a monarchy would be better.

Danger of Chaos Is Cited.

The foremost arguments of the monarchists is the danger of chaos reigning as in Mexico at Yuan Shih Kai's death. The succession of Vice President L Yuan Yang, who was the nation's hero in the anti-Manchu revolution, but who has been a prisoner on an island in the Winter palace grounds the past two years, would, it is declared, be unsatisfactory to some of Yuan Shih Kai's immediate supporters because it is asserted they would be unable to control him.

Yuan Shih Kai's eldest son is a partial invalid owing to an injury to his head sustained in being thrown from his horse, while his other sons are unimportant youths.

It is believed that the project will be consummated more or less speedily unless dangerous objection is displayed throughout the country, which is considered unlikely because the press is largely controlled by the government and the people apparently are willing to accept any government which will give them a period of peace.

Became Republic In 1912.

China became a republic Feb. 12, 1912, upon the abdication of the Emperor Kwang Seu, following the revolution of the previous year. A provisional constitution, formulated by the revolutionary government of Nanking, was accepted and under this a provisional parliament met in Peking April 8, 1913.

A permanent constitution was drafted and the articles dealing with the election and term of office of president and vice president were passed by parliament. Under these Yuan Shih Kai, Oct. 6, was elected president for a five year term.

TO EXCHANGE UNFIT CAPTIVES

England and Germany Also Agree to Civilians' Repatriation.

The English foreign office has announced that agreements had been reached with the German government regarding the repatriation of civilians unfit for military service and the further exchange of incapacitated prisoners of war monthly after October.

The decision as to the unfitness and incapacity in each case is to rest entirely with the government holding the prisoner and each case is to be judged on its merits.

Accident Board Ruling.

The California state industrial commission has awarded benefits under the compensation law to the heirs of a worker who was suffocated in a tank even though the worker had contributed nothing to the support of his mother and sisters during the nine months preceding his death. The board held that this was probably due to lack of employment. Benefits were awarded based upon his average contributions for three years prior to his death.

HE GROWS SALTED POTATOES

Wisconsin Farmer's "Spuds" Are Also Peppered and May Be Buttered.

Waupaca is generally acknowledged as the potato capital of Wisconsin and the United States. Hence it is natural a Waupaca man, E. J. Rose, conceived the idea of growing seasoned "spuds" ready for the table.

He claims his efforts are successful, and he has potato growers gasping with astonishment over his novel methods. It is solemnly asserted that this man has perfected a type that comes from the hill salted and peppered. He is now said to be working on a process that will butter the product. By planting a row of peppers between each row of potatoes it was a comparatively simple matter to inject the pepper taste.

Our Agricultural Possibilities.

With improvements which are steadily being made in American agriculture under the stimulus of a number of helpful agencies, including the department of agriculture and the land grant colleges, the chances for successful competition from abroad will become smaller and smaller. We must remember that not over 45 per cent of our arable land is yet under cultivation and that not more than 12 per cent of that is yielding full returns.—David F. Houston in American Review of Reviews.

Keep Out of Debt.

Think not your estate your own while any man can call upon you for money which you cannot pay.

TRAGEDY OF IGNORANCE.

It is not because of his toils that I lament for the poor. We must all toil, or steal (howsoever we name our stealing), which is worse; no faithful workman finds his task a pastime. The poor is hungry and athirst, but for him also there is food and drink; he is heavy laden and weary, but for him also the heavens send sleep, and of the deepest. In his smoky cribs a clear, dewy heaven of rest envelops him, and fitful glitterings of cloud skirted dreams. But what I do mourn over is, that the lamp of his soul should go out, that no ray of heavenly, or even of earthly, knowledge should visit him, but only in the haggard darkness, like two specters, fear and indigestion. Alas! while the body stands so broad and brawny, must the soul lie blinded, dwarfed, stupefied, almost annihilated? Alas! was this too, a breath of God, bestowed in heaven, but on earth never to be unfolded? That there should one man die ignorant who had capacity for knowledge, this I call a tragedy, were it to happen twenty times in the minute, as by some computations it does. —Carlyle.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOL OPENS WITH LARGE ENROLLMENT

St. Mary's Parociahl school, in connection with the Church of the Immaculate Conception, opened for the first time yesterday with 190 pupils enrolled. Six grades are now in operation and at present the school is held in the basement of the church. Rv. John Lindsman, whose untiring efforts have made the school possible, announced Sunday that the work in the upper floors of the school building would be completed next week and at that time the pupils will occupy their regular class-rooms. The enrollment is larger than Father Lindsman had anticipated and convinces those in charge that the school will receive the support of the parents of the parish.

The Sisters of Charity, among them several highly educated women who have received university degrees, are in charge of the school work. Most of the text-books used are those generally in use among the public schools of the state.

JEDADIAH N. GREEN.

Jedadiah N. Green, 88 years, a former resident of this section, died last Wednesday at his home in Almeda, Cal.

Mr. Green was born at Paris Hill, Oneida Co., in 1827, and moved to Palermo in 1865, and was a resident of this county until 1889, when he removed to California.

German Officials Working to Avoid Break; Heavy Task

Berlin, Tuesday, 1:35 A. M.—The American Ambassador, Mr. Gerard, had a long conversation last evening with Herr von Jagow, the German Minister of Foreign Affairs. The discussion did not concern specifically the submarine question, nor was it evoked by any new developments in connection with that subject, but it was indicated after the conference that both the Imperial Chancellor and the Foreign Minister are endeavoring to improve German-American relations.

Prominent and well informed persons in Berlin express the belief that the diplomatic and military leaders in Germany are doing their utmost to prevent a recurrence of misunderstanding and inciden in the submarine campaign which heretofore have clouded those relations and to eliminate so far as possible the chances of torpedoing ships under conditions to which the United States objects.

It is stated, however, that they are working under difficulties, particularly in view of the keenness and ambition of the naval officers and public opinion, which is proud of the submarine achievements and is quick to protest against any open indication of a backdown.

The reflex of the attitude can be seen in the press, from which an acrimonious and abusive tone toward America of late has been conspicuously absent. This is shown particularly in the comment on the Dumba incident, almost all of the newspapers which comment admitting frankly and without bitterness that the United States is justified in the action it has taken, and stating it need not affect Austro-American relations, although at the same time attempting to excuse Dr. Dumba through his patriotic interest in the Austro-Hungarian workers.

Furthermore, little is heard upon the munitions question, and some of the comment is in friendly tone.

Count to Ask Berlin for Disavowal of Attack

rounding the attack upon the Arabic. German's offer to submit this case to arbitration was considered, it is understood, in the light of this evidence.

Mr. Lansing and Count von Bernstorff found themselves agreed regarding the meaning of the German note in the Arabic case. They were both of the opinion that Germany therein offered to submit to arbitration the question of whether Germany was liable to indemnity to be paid the United States for the loss of American lives. Germany stated that she could not "acknowledge any obligation" to pay indemnity even if the submarine commander who sank the Arabic was mistaken concerning the offensive intentions of the vessel. But what Germany proposed was that instead of acknowledging this obligation she would submit the matter to arbitration and allow the court to decide whether there was such an obligation resting upon Germany. In other words, Germany wanted to test the question whether she is to pay indemnity when her commanders make errors of judgment.

But beyond this matter of agreeing upon the true meaning of the German note there remained for the discussion of Mr. Lansing and Count von Bernstorff the question of whether the evidence in the case did not in facti ndicate that the German defense of the Arabic attack was, top ut it crudely, fraudulent.

In other words, Count von Bernstorff, it is understood, was made to know that the United States might arbitrate an error, honestly made, but it would not arbitrate a fraud. That is the essence of the present serious differen.e between Germany and the United States.

If Germany is to make fraudulent defences of the attacks of her submarines and relp upon the process of arbitration to stave off a crisis for her the United States cannot deal with Germany. But if Germany is willing to honestly restrict her submarine commanders to an observance of the laws and to disavow their acts when they fail to obey the law, then the United States will be willing to submit to arbitration any case where there seems to have arisen an honest difference of opinion over the facts in a case.

Just before Mr. Lansing and the Ambassador entered into conference there was received from the German government a note regarding the atack upon the Orduna, which was fired upon with a torpedo and by shell fire by a submarine. The German government in this note disavows the act of the submarine commander, stating frankly that he exceeded his instructions in attacking the passenger vessel. But, after making this highly satisfactory explanation, the German government defends the submarine commander on the ground that the weather was bad and prevented the submarine commander from determining the character of the Orduna. Of course, from the American viewpoint, that is no excuse for the action of the submarine commander in atacking the Orduna.

But the fact that this excuse was added to this note does show officials here one highly significant fact, namely, that in writing these notes the German government evidently is laboring under the necessity of making excuses for its submarine commanders. It is conceivable to officials here, they say, that the German government could hardly criticise these navel officers in notes published broadcast over Germany. The military element is too powerful in Germany to let the Foreign Office Officials publicly castigate them in such fashion.

Consequently, it is thought, if Germany continues to send notes offering indemnity in one and disavowing the act in another, but always with apologies to the naval officers who broke the laws, the naval officers, under this system, might remain free to break the law without hesitation, depending alwaysu pon the German Foreign Office top repare some excuse.

LIGHTNING KILLS WELL KNOWN HANNIBAL FARMER

Fred Carter, 42, was instantly killed by a bolt of lightning during the heavy thunder storm yesterday afternoon as he stood on the porch of his home, near Hannibal Centre. A repeating rifle, standing in the corner of a room that opens on the porch, was split by the bolt, and a spruce tree directly in front of the porch was also struck. It is believed that the tree was struck first.

Nellie, Mr. Carter's daughter, went to call him after the storm had ceased and she found her father lying dead on the porch. Dr. Cusack was called at once but he said Mr. Carter was beyond aid.

Bernie Halstead was killed in the same manner at the same spot four years ago during an electrical storm.

The deceased is survived by his widow and five children. He followed the occupation of farming for many years.

Ginseng In China.

For many years past foreign doctors in China have endeavored to convince the Chinese that there is little or no virtue in ginseng as a remedy beyond its having a slight tonic quality. But, although they have been successful in introducing foreign drugs and medicines, they have failed to reduce the use of ginseng, as the Chinese still have great faith in it.

BABY SAVING IS NATION'S TASK

Speaker at Rochester Convention Tells How—Mothers Must Be Trained, Says Dr. Grace L. Meigs.

Rochester, Sept. 14.—Infant mortality, the pure-milk problem and the fly problem came up for vigorous discussion at a meeting of the section of Public Health officials.

Dr. Grace L. Meigs, of the Children's Bureau, Washington, D. C., made an address on the subject of reducing infant mortality.

"The prevention of infant mortality i s no longer a novelty and an experiment in public health work," she said. "The facts that the mortality of babies under one year constitutte about one-fifth of all the deaths that occur yearly at the ages and that one of the most common causes of infant mortality, the summer diarrhea of infants, is probably the factor in a community's mortality which is the most easily controlled by public health work, have convinced all public health workers who are interested in the reduction of mortality rates that here lies a field that cannot be neglected.

Three Causes of Mortality.

"Dr. Holt has well summed up infant mortality as having two fundamental causes, ignorance and poverty. Poverty, we cannot cure by public health means, but we must include in our program the protection of the poor from the community evils that are associated with poverty: From bad housing, impure milk, bad water, garbage and sanitary instances.

"Ignorance, we can cure. The ignorance of the mother, and the mother of the future, as to the care of herself and her baby—that is the bull's-eye at which the infant-welfare campaign is aimed.

"Three groups of causes together responsible for about three-fourths of the mortality of babies under 1 year: The diarrheal diseases, the so-called congenital diseases and the respiratory diseases. These differ greatly in the degree to which we can prevent them. The diarrheal diseases, which cause about one-fourth of the mortality of babies under 1 year are, as I have said, prevented with comparative ease. The great reduction in infant mortality rates have been reductions in the rate from this disease."

Mother-Training Only Weapon.

Dr. Meigs mentioned the controversy that existed as to whether this ill was the result of high temperatures, an infection carried through milk, or one of the many other attributed causes.

"Practice have proved," she said, "that one, or all, of these many causes may underlie the high infant mortality from summer diarrhea, but in combatting them all the training of the mother is our only weapon. The mother must be taught, above all, the necessity of breast feeding, the protection of the baby from infectionf rom flies, from soiled diapers, from impure milk; the proper care of the baby during the summer to prevent overheating by too many clothes or overcrowded rooms.

"The congenital diseases, or diseases of early infancy, including congenital malformations, premature birth and congenital debility, accidents at birth and other diseases peculiar to early infancy, claim the largest number of deaths. About one-third of the deaths of babies under 1 year are due to these causes. No more than a guess can be made as to the degree to which these diseases may be prevented. The definite effort to prevent them is a development of the last few years. Two problems are here involved, the ignorance of the prospective mother in the care of herself during pregnancy and the improper care by physician and midwife during pregnancy and at birth."

Favors Personal Instruction.

She acknowledged that the third element in the infant mortality, the respiratory diseases, is difficult to touch, the attempt to do so being a development of the past years.

"Here, too, said Dr. Meigs, "the only weapon is the education of the mother. She must be taught that the breast milk protects against all infections, that a baby must not be exposed to infections from a person suffering with colds, that respiratory infections in a baby must receive early attention and that the proper use of fresh air must be known.

Dr. Meigs then took up the methods of instruction, favoring personal instruction by the nurse in the home and by the physician at the Infants' Welfare Station. She told of the gradual spread of this infant-welfare work in the country, showing that the history of it had been that it was instituted by private philanthropy and then taken over by other cities as they became convinced of its value. She briefly touched upon such educational methods as pamphlets, bulletins and baby weeks, favoring them as wide distributors of knowledge in the care of babies.

SMALL SECURITY FOR BIG LOAN

New York, Sept. 14.—That it is the present intention of the Anglo-French Finance Commission, sent here to readjust conditions in the international money markets, to borrow $1,000,000,000 on the credit of Great Britain and France alone, and not to propose any so-called collateral loan, became evident yesterday to bankers who talked with Lord Reading and his fellow commissioners in the Biltmore Hotel.

In other words, the commission hopes to sell $1,000,000,000 British and French government bonds in the United States, and has no idea of attempting to obtain any funds by the deposit of American or other securities as collateral. It believes the credit of Great Britain and France, which hahs never been questioned, is ample security for the vast sum required even in the present conditions.

If the British and French governments are successful in floating the loan mentioned, every cent of the money is to be spent in the United States for wheat, cotton, meat and other commodities. To that extent the loan, it was said, would be commercial.

Question of Neutrality.

The object of the commission's visit here, declared one important banker, "is to restore conditions in the foreign exchange market which has been so greatly disarranged by the war. That is one of the most important missions ever undertaken, more important to the United States even than to the Allies. The United States has its cotton, wheat and other products to sell to the Allies and they want to buy them, but unless the foreign exchange conditions permit it, such business cannot be transacted.

"The great thing is to establish a commercial credit. Let the purchase of munitions take care of itself. The commission will push that aside until it has readjusted the rates of exchange on London and Paris."

The question of whether the sale of British and French Government bonds here would be a violation of the neutrality of the United States has been considered, it was said last night, and financiers familiar with the proposed arrangement had every reason to believe the administration in Washington would not interfere.

SCOUTS ORGANIZE TEAM FOR BASKETBALL GAMES

Troop No. 1, Boy Scouts of America, show early activity and a desire to get into the athletic game in advance of teams in this vicinity. At yesterday's meeting the preliminary work for getting a basketball team under way was taken up and the following officers were unanimously elected: Ralph Foster, captain; Herman Fitch, manager.

The team will this year average 110 pounds to the man and a fall schedule is desired with out of town teams averaging 110 pounds.

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom—Special Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 14.—To silence a popular clamor which has long been heard, the Constitutional Convention is on record as favoring an increase in the salary of the governor, having adopted a proposition to double it, so that if the people so will the chief executive of New York State will receive $20,000 a year. The increase will not take effect until 1917, however.

Under the present order of things, though the chief executive, the governor receives less for his services than judges or public service commissioners whom he has power to appoint. All of the public service commissioners who receive $15,000 each are appointed by the governor. The judges of the Court of Appeals and of the Supreme Court, when vacancies exist, are designated by the executive.

The exact language of the proposed amendment increasing the salary of the governor follows:

"The governor shall receive for his services an annual salary of ten thousand dollars until the firstd ay of January, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, after which he shall receive for his services an annual salary of twenty thousand dollars. There shall be provided for his use a suitable and furnished executive residence."

In the proposed amendment as presented there was no clause stating that the increase should not take place until 1917. The intention of the framers of the amendment was that the increase should take effect in 1916. Whitman, however, in a written statement to the delegates to the Constitutional Convention, called attention to the fact that the law prohibited that a public official should have his salary increased during his term. He asked that the proposed amendment be altered so as to provide that the increase should not be provided for until 1917. The term of office of Governor Whitman expires on January 1, 1917, unless he shall be re-elected for an additional term of two years.

Because of the personal expense of a governor, who is required to entertain and be active socially, it has long been thought that the salary he receives at the present time is inadequate. Called upon to attend functions in every section of the state, required to throw open the Executive Mansion to the public and to personally see that distinguished visitors are given the courtesies they are entitled to while in the capital city.

Although the salary of the governor is to be submitted to the people for their consideration, the clause in the original proposition that his term of office be extended to 4 years, was eliminated by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention. It was the plan of the Committee on Governor and Other State Officers to have it adopted, but all efforts to accomplish that end were futile. Likewise was the short ballot proposition amended, the majority of the delegates being of the opinion that it would be an unwise act to confer upon a governor the additional power that would result were the ideas of the committee above mentioned endorsed. Consequently, the increase in salary with the term of office to remain as it is and but three elective officers instead of five stricken from the ballot, form the two principal amendments so far as the executive department is concerned. The governor is given additional powers so far as the state finances are concerned, under the budget proposition, which while distinctly separate, has a bearing upon the prerogatives of the executive heretofore not enjoyed and which will prevail if the people so will.

ROYAL GUARDS ELECT THEIR NEW OFFICERS

The prevailing humidity of last evening had little effect upon the enthusiasm of the Royal Guards of the State Street M. E. Church, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Orin Bogardus, 405 East 4th st., South.

The main object of the meeting was to lay plans for an active fall and winter campaign of work, and to elect officers for the ensuing year, the following being elected:

Miss Frances Wells, president; Miss Mary Smith, vice-president; Miss Florence Briggs, secretary; Miss Ethel Chubb, treasurer.

At the conclusion of the business session a social hour was enjoyed.

LEADERS IN MAJOR LEAGUES ON THE WATCH

New York, Sept. 13.—The leaders in both major leagues were victorious today, allowing their rivals no opportunity to creep up on them. The Boston Americans won a double header from Chicago and thereby increased their lead to three and a half games over the Detroit Tigers, who won another game from New York.

All the teams in the three-cornered fight for the National League pennant won their games. Philadelphia took a thirteen-inning battle from Pittsburgh, while Brooklyn defeated St. Louis and Boston nosed out ahead of Chicago. Thus the Phillies retain a four-game lead. The Phillies have not lost a game since they suffered their recent severe setback at the hands of the Superbas at Brooklyn, while the Superbas and the Braves have been vacillating between second and third places without either being able to make an appreciable gain on Moran's men. The Phillies have played consistent baseball throughout the season, retaining the lead, except for the month when Chicago was on top.

MILITARY STRATEGY.

Retreating Through a City Is Disastrous to an Army.

If you suffer defeat in front of a great town and have to retreat through it under the blows of the victorious enemy you are in the worst possible position for conducting that retreat. The streets of the town (but few of which will run parallel to your course and can, therefore, serve as avenues of escape for your army) are so many defiles in which your columns will get hopelessly congested. The operation may be compared to the pouring of too much liquid into a funnel which has too small an orifice. Masses of your transport will remain clogged outside the place. You will run the risk of a partial and perhaps of a complete disaster as the enemy presses on.

There is very much more than this. A great town cannot but contain, if you have long occupied it, the material of your organization. You will probably abandon documents which the enemy should not see. You will certainly, in the pressure of such a flight, lose accumulated stores. Again, the transverse streets are so many points of "leakage" into which your congested columns will bulge out and get confused. Again, you will be almost necessarily dealing with the complications of a mass of civilian conditions which should never be allowed to interrupt a military operation.

In general, to fight in front of a great town when the chances are against you is as great an error as to fight in front of a marsh with few causeways. So far as mere topography is concerned, it is a greater error still.—From "The Elements of the Great War," by Hilaire Belloc.

How to Write Advertising Copy

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

A SKILLED layer of mosaic works with small fragments of stone—they fit into more places than the larger chunks. The skilled advertiser works with small words—they fit into more minds than big phrases.

The simpler the language the greater certainty that it will be understood by the least intelligent reader.

The construction engineer plans his roadbed where there is a minimum of grade—he works along the lines of least resistance.

The advertisement which runs into mountainous style is badly surveyed—all minds are not built for high grade thinking.

Advertising must be simple. When it is tricked out with the jewelry and silks of literary expression, it looks as much out of place as a ball dress at the breakfast table!

The buying public is only interested in facts. People read advertisements to find out what you have to sell.

The advertiser who can fire the most facts in the shortest time gets the most returns. Blank cartridges make noise but they do not hit—blank talk, however clever, is only wasted space.

You force your salesmen to keep to solid facts—you don't allow them to sell muslin with quotations from Omar or trousers with excerpts from Marie Corelli. You must not tolerate in your printed selling talk anything that you are not willing to countenance in personal salesmanship.

Cut out clever phrases if they are inserted to the sacrifice of clear explanations—write copy as you talk. Only be more brief. Publicity is costlier than conversation—ranging in price downward from $10 a line; talk is not cheap, but the most expensive commodity in the world.

Sketch in your ad to the stenographer. Then you will be so busy "saying it" that you will not have time to bother about the gewgaws of writing. Afterwards take the typewriten manuscript and cut out every word and every line that can be erased without omitting an important detail. What remains in the end is all that really counted in the beginning.

Cultivate brevity and simplicity. "Savon Français" may look smarter, but more people will understand "French Soap." Sir Isaac Newton's explanation of gravitation covers six pages but the schoolboy's terse and homely "What goes up must come down" clinches the whole thing in six words.

Indefinite talk wastes space. It is not 100% productive. The copy that omits prices sacrifices half its pulling power—it has a tendency to bring lookers instead of buyers. It often creates false impressions. Some people are bound to conceive the idea that the goods are higher priced than in reality—others, by the same token, are just as likely to infer that the prices are lower and go away thinking that you have exaggerated your statements.

The reader must be searched out by the copy. Big space is cheapest because it doesn't waste a single eye. Publicity must be on the offensive. There are far too many advertisers who keep their lights on top of their bushel—the average citizen hasn't time to overturn your bushel.

Small space is expensive. Like a one-flake snowstorm, there is not enough of it to lay.

Space is a comparative matter after all. It is not a case of how much is used but how it is used. The passengers on the limited express may realize that Jones has tacked a twelve-inch shingle on every post and fence for a stretch of five miles, but they are going too fast to make out what the shingles say, yet the two-feet letters of Brown's big bulletin board on top of the hill leap at them before they have a chance to dodge it. And at that it doesn't cost nearly so much as the sum total of Jones' dinky display.

Just so advertisements attractively displayed every day or every week for a year in one newspaper will find the eye of all readers, no matter how rapidly they may be "going" through the advertising pages, and produce more results than a dozen piking pieces of copy scattered through half a dozen papers.

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

Ambrose Peale, press agent, meets Rodney and agrees to go into business with the lad on a salary basis. Rodney has resolved to go into the soap industry and buck the trust.

Rodney, Peale and Mary go into the soap trade together. Rodney then endeavors to borrow $10,000 as capital for his newly formed company.

CHAPTER IV—Continued.

In a moment Rodney himself bounded in again on her day dreams. There was the thud of a heavy kit bag dropped on the marble floor of the hall by the front door, and then he ran in to her impetuously, with his arms open.

"Mary, sweetheart!" he cried.

He held her away from him a moment to regard her face.

"The pater's upstairs dressing for dinner," he rattled on. "I shan't even say goodby to him. Serve him right. I'm going to take a stage down to the Collegiate club this very night. Can't afford cabs now."

"Rodney," whispered Mary conservatively, "you must work hard and be brave."

"And can't I do that for the sweetest sweetheart in the whole world?" he demanded rapturously, folding her again in his arms. He hugged her greedily to him, and she yielded to him a little despite herself. There was something fresh and clean about the boy, and certainly his kisses were not distasteful. The arms she felt around her were a man's arms and very strong.

In the end Rodney decided he would have a cab anyway, and so he and Mary left the house of the soap king in each other's company without farewells. It was their last ride together, so to speak, and a very blissful one for the young lover. Rodney was going to take a room at the Collegiate club, but first they spun across the somber park to Mary's apartment, somewhere in the West Seventies, and Rodney bade her a rapturous good night while the motor throbbed and the taximeter spun.

The gout had been so benefited by the explosion of yesterday that Cyrus Martin had gone down to his office next morning, as Mary guessed he would, and the two met there on somewhat more impersonal terms than in the Fifth avenue library. Very impersonal indeed Mary tried to make it seem to the wily magnate and threw something unwonted and chilly into the manner with which she greeted him.

"Well," he began, "do you think our scheme is going to work?"

"Yes," said Mary quietly, "I do."

"You really think you have got him to go to work?" he demanded eagerly.

"I have," said Mary.

"By George, that's great!" said Mr. Martin gleefully.

"Isn't it " said Mary.

"You're sure he wasn't just talking?"

"No, he went upstairs to pack and go out and make a name for himself."

"You're a wise girl, Mary. Isn't it wonderful?"

"And you said I couldn't do it," said Mary coldly.

"I said I didn't think you could, but you have, and I owe you $2,500."

"Oh, there's no hurry!" said Mary, still quite coolly.

"Never put off till tomorrow the money you can get today," said the millionaire.

"Aren't you proud I've been so successful?" said Mary presently.

"Proud! I'm so darned happy I'm making this check out for $5,000."

"Oh, Mr. Martin!" Mary cried, quite taken aback.

"It's worth $50,000 to me to have my boy really want to work, not just to do it to please me," said the old man, really moved beneath his gruff exterior. "What a difference an incentive makes!"

"Doesn't it?" said Mary, smiling at her check.

"But what about your marriage?"

"He said he wouldn't marry me till he'd made good—if I'd just wait."

Her employer looked at her a little anxiously.

"Do you think perhaps he may really love you?" he asked.

"Of course not," said Mary.

"It's the first time he's actually wanted to marry anybody," said his father.

"Oh, it's just that I've been very blue eyed and baby faced!" said the secretary modestly.

"I guess you're right," agreed Martin.

"Of course I am. Why, dear Mr. Martin, even for this," she said, pointing to her check, "I wouldn't give your son one real pang. He's too nice a boy. When I break our engagement he may feel a bit lonely and be very sorry for himself for a few days and give up women forever, but pretty soon some charming girl of his own position—of his own world, who needs to be petted and spoiled and protected, some limousine lady—will come along, and they'll live happily ever after."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Martin. "I don't agree with you at all. I begin to wish this marriage were going to be on the level."

"It wouldn't work out," Mary interrupted. "I'm a business woman. Marriage and the fireside and leaning on some man are not for me. I've been independent too long. I couldn't stop my work for a man, and there can't be two heads in a family—two happy heads. Even if your son did love me—really love—I wouldn't marry him. Just now he's twenty-four, with an india rubber heart that is easy to stretch and easier to snap back. All men at twenty-four are like that."

"I suppose so," Mr. Martin commented reminiscently. "I remember when I was a young man there was a girl—my heart was broken for a week—perhaps ten days—however, however"—Then, abruptly changing the subject, he inquired, "What's my son going to work at?"

"I don't know yet," Mary said truthfully.

"Do you think he'll make good?"

"He will if he keeps at it."

"Well, you'll keep him at it, won't you?"

"That wasn't our agreement," said Mary. "I only undertook to get him to start to work."

"Hm!" went Mr. Martin, tapping the arm of his chair.

"Isn't that true?" demanded Mary quietly.

"Quite, quite," said Martin cannily. "I was just thinking we might make some agreement to have you keep him on the job."

"To keep him on the job?" echoed Mary faint heartedly. Here was a new complication if the soap king was proposing a second chapter in the deception. She had honestly meant to give the whole thing up. She truly did not want Rodney to get permanently interested in her. She had let him kiss her—the memory of his kisses still trembled on her lips—but she had done that for the boy's own good. Poor little secretary, pretty little Mary Grayson, what was she to think of things, how cleave her way through this tangle of motives that bound her heart and hands? She had let him kiss her, yes, but had it really been wrong in her? Was it—bad? No, she found her whole soul protesting, it was not wrong or bad. It had been for the boy's own good, she told herself again. She hugged the thought greedily, tasting a portion of that joy of women in giving herself up to some man for his good. But she would not spoil his life. She had been firm as to that. And now here was old Mr. Martin coming back at her with this hateful power of money and trying to bribe her to go on. What should she do?

Suddenly, by a complete change of venue, her thoughts attacked the case from a different angle. She had been enough in the business world to know the power and use of money, and from a French grandfather she had inherited a streak of the keen and honest thrift. Let the rich people look out for themselves; the poor had to. Curiosity, too, set in, and helped dictate her answer when she finally made it.

"Well," she said at last enigmatically, "I'm a business woman."

Mr. Martin looked at her delightedly.

"What strikes you as fair?" he asked her.

"I'd rather the proposition came from you," rejoined Mary.

"What do you say to your present salary, and at the end of the year I will personally give you a check for 25 per cent of what he has made?"

"That wouldn't interest me," said Mary.

"What's your proposition then?" asked Martin. "State your terms."

"My present salary doubled," said the business woman promptly.

"Um—that's pretty steep."

"You told me what I'd done already was worth $50,000 to you," retorted Mary.

"Merely a figure of speech, my dear," said Martin. "Let's see, you're getting $40 a week, and"—

"Fifty dollars, and I want $100."

"Sounds like a hold up."

"Then let's drop it. This new contract was your idea, not mine. Good evening"—

She moved to the door.

"Hold on, hold on," Martin cried after her. "I was simply figuring," he explained; "tell you what I'll do. Seventy-five dollars a week and 10 per cent of what he makes."

"Then let's drop it."

"All right, I'll go you," said Mary.

"Good," said Mr. Martin.

"Will you just write me a note stating the facts and consideration?" Mary pursued.

"Certainly."

He began to write, and as his pen moved across the paper Mary went on:

"As soon as you see Rodney you'll have to discharge me."

"I will, violently. I'm a pretty good actor under your direction."

CHAPTER V.

Peale Makes Progress.

RODNEY left the club and went home. He skipped upstairs to his room two steps at a time and began flinging things out of drawers and chiffoniers. What trunk should he take—that new one he had made in Paris last summer "before the war?" No, he could send for that later, and besides, he didn't want to stay away from Mary any longer than he could help. He wouldn't take all his things just now; he would leave a good many behind, so that his father would be sorry if he ever came into his room again after his baby boy was gone. He would not take a trunk at all now—just his kit bag. Where

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

AN economical wardrobe is here given for the young girl who follows in a modified degree the fashions of her elders. That means for this year flaring skirt, short or round waist, still some jumpers—always a useful style for remodeling old frocks—short coats, usually belted for the young girl, though Eton and bolero jackets are coming to the fore.

From three to three and a half yards round is a good width for the skirt of a schoolgirl, which should reach to her shoe tops. The excessive flare, often seven and eight yards around, not only takes more material, but means much more sewing and is far from girlish.

The skirts are not especially hard to make, as they are kept rather close fitting around the hips, and the flare is made by the cut. Often the skirt is gathered to the waist band, sometimes laid in plaits, and some pretty girlish models show the fullness held in by shirrings at the hip.

Tucks around the skirts are a favorite trimming. A girlish trimming is a three inch hem at the bottom of the skirt with two three inch tucks six inches apart.

For the separate waists three may be of madras or lawn made on tailored lines. Often the young girl makes all her sport blouses over the "middy" pattern. Both long and three-quarter sleeves are permissible, and the neck is slightly V. The collars may be attached or adjustable, as preferred.

Three blouses may be of mull, batiste, dotted swiss or, far best of all, over lace in a girlish design of dot or small flower of point d'esprit.

A fine serge is the nicest thing for a middy suit. One of the cotton gowns may be a middy in white kindergarten cloth, to which there may be several sets of collars and cuffs—one dull blue, another rose, a third white with red or blue bandings or mercerised braid. Another cotton gown may be pink chambray made without other trimming than tucks. This is good either on jumper lines to be worn with white guimpe or with a single breasted blouse opening up the front, slightly V neck and worn with white all over embroidery or embroidered linen cuffs and collars.

For the afternoon dresses lawn, dimity, dotted swiss, cotton voile, linen—though it wrinkles badly—mull and batiste are all good. For the silk foulard or india silk give girlish results. Be sure they are spot proof; better yet, that they wash. The suit may be of serge, covert cloth or poplin. Soft tones are popular, but a warm navy blue is the best choice for a girl who must wear her suit two years. If there is a good suit from last year—provided the skirt is not too narrow—the new suit may be of white serge for best wear. This dyes well when it has been cleaned several times.

For the sport coat choose a lightweight tweed or one of the summer weight chinchillas or wool mixtures. These are more sensible than the linens or fancy mercerised silk and cotton mixtures that are stylish, but do not give enough protection after tennis and other heating sports.

For the dancing dresses, which may include a graduation gown, mulls, embroidered batiste, nets—dotted, plain or the new craquele patterns—or flowered organdies are dainty, girlish and inexpensive. They are far nicer for summer wear than crepe de chine, chiffon or silks.

How to Make Attractive and Serviceable Bed Comforts.

Any of the new flowered silk or silkaline goods make handsome bed comforts with very little trouble and at small cost. They may be filled with cotton wadding, or old blankets may be used for the filling in place of the wadding. They should be about two yards square.

A dainty pink and green flower spray on a white ground is pretty, bound around the edge with plain silkaline. Pink zephyr tufting holds the material together in the center, while the edges are stitched by machine.

When comforts are made of silk the border should be placed at the extreme edge of the comfort, because silk does not come as wide as silkaline. Japanese silk is especially attractive for the purpose. Silk muslins, both plain and fancy, are much used for bed comforts.

How to Make Brazil Nut Salad.

Shred crisp and well washed celery and cut up rather fine, or in only four or five pieces, each kernel of an equal quantity of Brazil nuts. Mix these together and dress with mayonnaise dressing. Tiny dice of bread and butter are sometimes added to this salad and a cream dressing added. Salt rising bread cut first in thin slices, heavily buttered and used in this combination, adds food value and novelty. It is an English vegetarian's idea.

How to Remove Rust Stains.

Rust stains can be easily removed by putting vinegar and salt on the stain and placing it in the warm sunshine. Repeat this until the stain is removed. The vinegar and salt together are very active and will remove the stain more quickly than lemon and salt.

HOW TO KEEP MOSQUITOES AWAY.

To keep mosquitoes away from one while asleep it is recommended that the following solution be prepared and a few drops put on the pillow and on a towel near the head of the bed:

Oil of citronella	1 oz.
Spirits of camphor	1 oz.
Oil of cedar	1½ oz.

Another preparation for the same purpose is:

Oil of lavender	1 oz.
Alcohol	1 oz.
Castor oil	1 oz.

This is not as unpleasant as the other mixture, and a few drops can be sprinkled on the face and hands and on a towel hung at the end of the bed.

Orange peel burned in the room is also an efficacious mosquito killer. For mosquito bites plain soap applied to the bitten places is effective. Other remedies are ammonia, alcohol, glycerin, bicarbonate of soda, sugar, calcium chloride.

TEST FOODS.

Many Household Staples Found to Be Adulterated.

Housewives ought to have a bit of many kinds of knowledge. The perfect housewife must not only have a thorough knowledge of the cuisine, but she must also be an excellent business woman and know how to apply business methods to her home. She must have a practical acquaintance with chemistry and biology and must have the art of making a house into a home.

Just at present the women in the home need another kind of knowledge which will prove invaluable to them at many a time. That is how to know if their food is adulterated. There are, unfortunately, frauds in every line of work, and the food frauds always seize upon such occasions as the present, when the authorities are busy elsewhere, to perpetrate the worst crimes against the community. Probably foodstuffs all over will be adulterated and the wise housewife will learn how to detect the presence of foreign elements in the provisions she buys.

Butter is one of the first to suffer. Margarine has often been used as a substitute in the past and probably will be passed off many times in the future. While margarine is perfectly wholesome, still no woman wants to pay the price of butter for the less costly margarine. A reliable test is, melt a little bit in a spoon over a gas burner. Good butter froths a great deal, but makes very little noise. Margarine, on the contrary, crackles and bursts and makes little explosive sounds. After applying this test you can refuse to buy again at the same shop if you detect the presence of margarine in the substance which you bought as butter.

The easiest and commonest food to adulterate is milk. Watered milk is almost as common as plain water, but it is so easy to discover the fraud that no housewife need be taken in by it. Pour your milk into a pail or pot. Then take a fairly stout, very bright knitting needle and plunge it into the milk. If, on removal, a large drop of the fluid clings to the end of the needle for quite a time without falling off you may feel quite sure that the milk is all right. If, on the other hand, the liquid runs right off the steel needle and forms no lasting drop the milk has certainly been watered.

Mint Relishes.

Green Peas and Mint.—Shell green peas just before they are to be cooked. Line the top of a double boiler with green lettuce leaves, put the peas in, add a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, cover and cook until done, which will be about half an hour or perhaps forty minutes. Then drain, add a tablespoonful of finely minced mint, salt and pepper and two tablespoonfuls of butter.

Mint Sauce.—In taking your walks abroad at this season bring home with you if you can a handful of mint from the brookside. To make the sauce that goes so excellently well with spring lamb or game chop fine the well washed leaves of a bunch of mint, then pour over them a cupful of boiling water and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar. Cover and let stand in a cool place for an hour to fuse; then add a quarter of a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of paprika and four tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Mix thoroughly and serve with the meat.

Mint Chutney—Add to a handful of finely minced mint leaves a cupful of seeded raisins, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one of tomato ketchup and a saltspoonful of salt. Mash and mix until juicy; then serve in a boat with cold meats.

Mint Sherbet.—Take six lemons, two oranges, two cupfuls of sugar, two cupfuls of water, one large bunch of fresh mint, the white of one egg and a piece of green leaf the size of a pea. Squeeze the juice from the lemons and oranges. Pour cold water over the peelings and put on the stove, allowing it to come to a boil; then pour it over the sugar and mint, which has been cut up fine. Cover it and allow it to steep for an hour. Then strain over the juice of the lemons and oranges. Dissolve the green leaf in a little of the mixture until it is clear and then add to the juices. Mix the ingredients together with the white of an egg, well beaten, and put in the freezer. Serve in sherbet glasses garnished with a tiny sprig of mint.

NEW SKIRTS SMART AND IN GOOD TASTE.

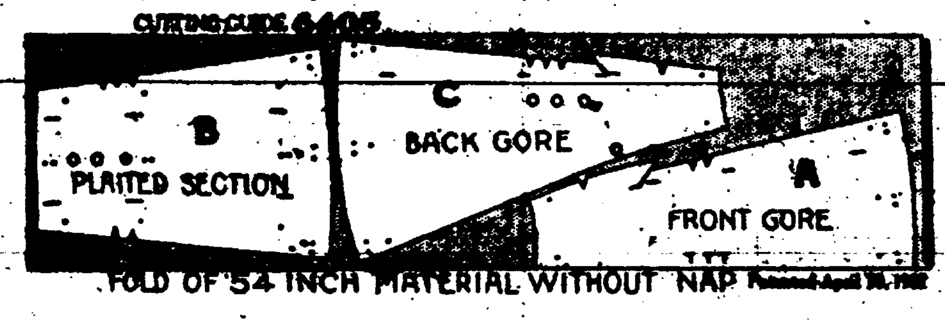
The vogue for combining materials may find expression in this three-piece skirt. Gabardine and chiffon cloth or velvet and satin are suggested for fashionable use.

The skirts for Autumn wear are not sensational in line, and the woman who is watching their development is beginning to breathe easier. A decided feature of the fashionable skirt is a plainness at the front and frequently at the back, but an emphatic fulness at the sides obtained in various ways, as often by pleats as by any other means.

Suitable to development in kitten's ear cloth, duvetyn, broadcloth, chiffon poplin or serge is the accompanying model, a three-piece affair with pleated section inserted at the sides. In medium size the skirt requires 2⅞ yards 54-inch material. The buttons may be of the same or contrasting material.

The new skirts are more exacting than ever as regards precision in cutting. They are full at the bottom, but because of the inclination to define the hip and waist-lines there must not be any suggestion of sagging or stretching, either of which easily could be the outcome of indifferent cutting. The material is folded, of course, that the two parts of each section will be cut at the same time. Only the front gore, however, is placed on a lengthwise fold of the goods. The pleated section, which is laid into position first, is on a lengthwise thread of the material. To the right of this the back gore is placed, then the front gore, mention of which already has been made.

There was never a season when the colors for street wear were so limited as this Fall, but the difference is more than adjusted in the variety of materials in which smart skirts and costumes can be made. Combinations of contrasting fabrics are in excellent vogue. For instance, the skirt illustrated may be in gabardine, with side panels of heavy chiffon cloth. Velvet and satin are also used with great success.



Pictorial Review Skirt No. 6405. Sizes 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32, 34 and 36 inches waist. Price, 15 cents.

For Young Folks

In Staten Island, New York

Recently in the borough of Richmond, a part of the city of New York, which comprises all of Staten Island, situated in New York bay, there was held a great baby show. Hundreds of little ones from all over the borough were entered for the various prizes. There were many prizes offered for the fattest baby, the most beautiful, the healthiest, the largest for its age, for the tallest and for the shortest, and all the classes were well filled. The charming little miss who captured the prize for beauty is shown in the accompanying picture holding the cup that was awarded her. Among so many handsome children it must have been a difficult question for the judges to decide. But they one and all agreed that Miss Esther Morris was worthy of the high honor. As you can see by the picture, Miss Esther is a young lady of exceeding beauty, but she is altogether too young to care about that, but was highly pleased with the handsome prize.

Paper and Pencil Game.

When your friends come give them each a paper and pencil and see how many can write the correct answers to these questions:

Name a battle found in every farmyard?

Name an uninhabited battle?

Name a battle unpleasant to barefoot boys?

Name two battles that are found in a forest?

Name a good luck battle?

Name a stimulating battle?

Name an observing battle?

Name a comfortable battle?

Name a college battle?

Name a wealthy battle?

Name a cleanly battle?

Name a suspended battle?

Answers: Cowpens. Wilderness. Stony Point. Fair Oaks and Seven Pines. Horseshoe. Brandywine. Lookout Mountain. Fort Pillow. Princeton. Rich Mountain. White Plains. Suspended Rock.

"Fool Monkey."

In this as in so many games it lends ease if the players sit in a circle and select a leader.

The leader then starts the game by naming an animal whose name begins with "A," as "antelope." The player on his left at once takes this up and adds to it another animal, the name beginning with "B," saying, "Antelope, bison," and passing the turn to his left hand neighbor, who repeats the list, adding, say, "Camel" for "C." And so it goes on, soon becoming a serious tax on the memory and alertness of the players.

Whoever bungles the catalogue or fails to find an animal with the letter for which he or she is responsible is hailed in mockery as "fool monkey," and this name must be mentioned by succeeding players instead of the animal which the delinquent ought to have uttered, but muddled.

Experience shows that the ranks of the "fool monkey" will soon be well filled.

Interesting Bird Items.

Birds seen eating army worms were: Robins, catbirds, meadow larks, chewinks, thrushes and wrens.

In Germany the owners of vineyards are encouraged by their government to distribute nesting material and erect birdhouses in their vineyards to attract feathered foes of insect pests.

The swiftest bird is said to be the frigate bird. This bird is able to fly, under favorable conditions, 200 miles an hour.

Earliest Watches.

Some of the earliest watches were made in Nuremberg. Their shape was almost round, and they were called "Nuremberg eggs."

Why the Owl Is Wise.

"As wise as an owl," my father said
One day while talking to Uncle Ted.

Now I've thought and thought about that speech,
And every time I hear one screech

I say to myself, "As wise as an owl,"
And wish that I at night might prowl

So I could learn to be as wise
And see as much with my wee eyes.

You know the owl can see at night;
They say he has such wondrous sight.

So he must know each elf that roams
And witches, kelpies, goblins, gnomes.

And that is why the grownups say,
"As wise as an owl"—'tis as plain as day.

One Cent an Hour For Women.

Wages at the rate of a ½ penny or 1 cent an hour are paid to many women workers in the Belfast linen factories, according to a statement made by Miss M. Galway of the Textile Operatives' Society of Ireland. One cent an hour, she says, is paid to women who clip the threads of machine embroidered cushion covers.

TONNAGE OF A VESSEL.

Just What It Is and the Methods by Which It Is Measured.

To find the tonnage or displacement of a ship is rather puzzling. The tonnage of a ship is the measure of its cubical or carrying capacity expressed in tons. At the present time there are four methods in use of expressing the tonnage of a ship, known respectively as the gross tonnage, the net register tonnage, the deadweight tonnage and the displacement tonnage.

In calculating the gross tonnage the whole interior capacity of the ship below the tonnage deck is found, including that of all covered in spaces on deck used for stowage, and the result in cubic feet is divided by 100.

The net register tonnage is the gross tonnage minus all the spaces used for the accommodation of the crew and instruments and the working parts of the ship. It is on the net register tonnage that almost invariably dues are paid.

The deadweight tonnage is the measure of the exact amount of cargo that a ship can carry without sinking too deep in the water.

The displacement tonnage is the space occupied by the ship in the water. The amount of water displaced by a ship is, of course, equal in weight to the ship and all it contains. As one ton is equal to thirty-five cubic feet of water, the displacement tonnage is found by dividing the number of cubic feet of water displaced by thirty-five when the ship is immersed up to its draft or load line.—London Standard.

GEOLOGIC PERIODS.

Stories of Time Told by Fossilized Plants and Animals.

Scientists hesitate to estimate geological time in terms of years. Such estimates have, however, been made, and one published by Professor Charles Schuchert in 1910 states that about 12,000,000 years have elapsed since the close of the carboniferous age, an age, as the name suggests, in which great deposits of carbon, in coal, were being formed in many parts of the world. This age has been divided by geologists into the Mississippian, Pennsylvanian and Permian epochs, of which the Mississippian is the oldest and the Permian the youngest. The Pennsylvanian epoch alone is estimated by Schuchert to have covered 2,160,000 years, and animal life is supposed to have existed on the earth for over 14,000,000 years before that time.

Geologic periods are recognized primarily by the animals and plants that lived in them, so that the study of fossils plays a very real and important part in the progress of geologic knowledge.

Rocks of carboniferous age, as shown by their fossils, have a wide distribution in the United States, and they are apt to abound in these remains of plant and animal life. The fossil shells which are found in them, however, may vary greatly from point to point, because the animals they represent lived in different periods of geologic time or in different regions in the carboniferous ocean.—Argonaut.

Languages.

The principal languages of the world are listed in order as follows: English, spoken by more than 150,000,000 people; German, more than 120,000,000; Russian, more than 90,000,000; French, more than 60,000,000; Spanish, more than 55,000,000; Italian, more than 30,000,000, and Portuguese, more than 30,000,000. These seven are the principal languages of Europe and America. There are said to be 3,424 spoken languages or dialects in the world—1,624 in America, 937 in Asia, 587 in Europe and 276 in Africa. Among other important languages are the Chinese, Japanese, Scandinavian branches, Slavonic speeches and dialects and the various languages of India, Persia, Arabia and modern Greece.

A Poor Present.

A wounded soldier explained his grievance to his nurse.

"You see, old Smith was next me in the trenches. Now, the bullet that took me in the shoulder and laid me out went into 'im and made a bit of a flesh wound in his arm. Of course I'm glad he wasn't 'urt bad. But he's stuck to my bullet and given it 'is girl. Now, I don't think that's fair. I'd a right to it. I'd never give a girl o' mine a second 'and bullet."—Exchange.

New York City's Pensions.

New York city has eight pension funds. They are the public school teachers' retirement fund, the police pension fund, the fire department relief fund, the department of health fund, the College of the City of New York fund, the supreme court appellate division fund, the street cleaning department fund and the city of New York employees' retirement fund.—New York Mail.

Diplomacy.

"Johnny," said the indignant parent, "why didn't you come home when I called you?"

"I didn't hear you," replied truthful John.

"Then why did you run away?"

"Because I was afraid that I might hear you."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Family Joys.

"When you were courting me," said his wife, "you declared there wasn't another woman in the world like me."

"Yes," replied her husband, "and I'm glad of it—for the sake of other men."

In common things the law of sacrifice takes the form of positive duty.—Froude.

TODAY'S FASHION NOTE

Combinations of cloth and fur are among the luxuries of the season's dress, yet they are exceedingly stylish. This costume in kitten's ear cloth trimmed with baby lamb carries out a blue and black color scheme. The cloth forms the skirt, while the fur is used for the bodice and skirt trimmings, also the toque and melon muff. It is an excellent way to use left-over furs. Three yards 44-inch material is needed for the skirt.

JAMS AND JELLIES.

PEACH JELLY.—Peaches never make a firm jelly that will retain its shape when turned from a mold, but no jelly is more delicious for cake fillings. For jelly select peaches not quite ripe enough for eating. Rub off the down with a rough cloth, cut in pieces, saving pits. Cover with water and cook slowly, closely covered, until the fruit is perfectly soft. Turn into a jelly bag and hang to drip. When the juice is all extracted measure and allow to every pint of juice a pound of sugar and the juice of a lemon. Set the sugar in the oven to heat and place the liquid uncovered over the fire. Cook steadily twenty minutes, add the heated sugar, stir until dissolved, cook five minutes, then strain through a cheesecloth. Use pits for flavoring.

Mint Jelly.—Take a pint of freshly gathered mint leaves, wash and add to them a quart of water and a cupful of tarragon vinegar, two cupfuls of sugar, a dash of paprika and a teaspoonful of salt. Boil gently for twenty minutes. Add a half package of gelatin that has been standing in a little cold water, let all heat and melt, then strain carefully into little glasses to set. This is excellent to serve with cold meats or to use in fresh cucumber salad with French dressing or mayonnaise.

Rose Leaf Jam.—Gather a quantity of fresh red and pink rose leaves when they have unfolded after a recent shower and to every solid pint add a scant pint of sugar. To six pints of the leaves add one quart of distilled water. Let all slowly heat and melt. When it reaches the boiling point stir carefully and boil twenty minutes, turn into little jam pots and when cold cover down for use. This is good to serve with ice cream, for cake filling or for sandwiches.

Gooseberries and Red Raspberries.—Gooseberries and red raspberries in equal parts make fine preserves. For this combination use one pound of sugar to each pound of fruit, as the gooseberries are tart. In combining raspberries and rhubarb use two parts raspberries and one part rhubarb.

French Cooking Terms.

Bouillon—A plain, clear soup.

Braise—Meat cooked slowly in a covered pan.

Consomme—Clear soup or bouillon, boiled down until very rich.

Armored Aeroplanes Will Guard London; Built Here

England, and abord the sme vessel are half a dozen of her prototypes, while in the works at Toronto hundreds more of a like pattern are being constructed.

These aeroplanes have a maximum speed of one hundred miles an hour. They are capable of carrying six men and a large amount of explosives, and are equipped with four machine guns and a powerful searchlight. In addition, they all have the Sperry stabilizer and a newly perfected bomb dropping device. In order to meet the demands from the British and French governments, the Sperry Gyroscope Company, in Brooklyn, is erecting a plant twice the size of its present one.

Fully equipped the great warp lanes are expected to fly at an altitude of 12,000 feet forf ourh ours. This is 3,000 feet higher than the usual altitude of the Zeppelins. With their revolving searchlights and a signalling system, it is expected it will be possible to circumvent any attack by German dirgibles on any vital spot along the English coast, and to make it impossible for any Zeppilin to reach London.

VIEWS OF STATE EDITORS.

Prospects of Republican success in the coming election are reflected in the large number seeking nominations. For nearly every office to be filled there are a dozen active candidates.—Buffalo News.

This condition of the government's finances means that the administration will be compelled soon to borrow money for ordinary expenses, that is, to sell bonds. And it also means that there must be an increase in taxes. The additional taxes may be called "war taxes," although the United States is not at war, but they should be called "deficit taxes" and the people should realize that the necessity for them arises from Democratic mismanagement.—White Plains Record.

In 1914 the Secretary of State of Massachusetts reported 12,380 candidates for office. This year the number is but 10,774. The Republicans increased their figures by 1,112 and the Democrats lowered their by 337, but the Moose party shows the greatest discrepancy. In 1914 there was 3,074 Progressives ambitious for office. This year but 692 petitions for nominations. The loss is 77.4 per cent, which is probably a reflection of the individual shift and gain for the Republican party. The figures show that the Republicans expect more offices and the Democrats fewer. It is evident in every state that not only has the Republican party gained by the return of the Progressives, but that the Democratic party vote will be much reduced—Watertown Standard.

Seville Nights.

In all the principal places and gardens of Seville moving picture screens are erected and small tables and chairs set out, the exhibitors either making their profits from the drinks sold or by rental of chairs at 2 cents each. Thousands of people go nightly to the different plazas and gardens, and the entire life of the city for about four months centers around these moving picture shows.—Commerce Reports.

Leakage In Steam Pipes.

To make a permanent cement for stopping leakage in steam pipes where caulking or plugging is impossible, mix black oxide of manganese and raw linseed oil, using enough oil with the manganese to bring it to a thick paste. Apply to the pipe or joint at leak. If the pipe be kept sufficiently warm to absorb the oil from the manganese, in twenty-four hours the cement will be as hard as the iron pipe.

CARE OF GOOD CLOTHES.

The Finer the Stuff the More Watchful One Should Be.

It is a very common mistake to believe that good materials, whether of cotton, silk or wool, need less care than cheap ones. How often does one complain of the lack of wearing quality in a garment for which a big price has been paid. Yet, most frequently, what has worn out the fabric has not been actual use, but the neglect it has suffered.

One of the principal differences between good and cheap materials is that the better grades are finer spun. This may mean that the fabric is stronger and, in proportion to the uses to which it is put, may wear longer, but it also means that each tiny thread by itself is weaker and more apt to injury. Anything which may attack the threads one by one, therefore, does more harm with fine goods than with coarse.

No matter how careful one may try to be, clothes that one wears gradually get a trifle of the grease from the perspiration of the body. In spite of constant watching clothes will become dusty. This combination of dust and body moisture forms a regular breeding ground for tiny little vegetable growths. These are so small that it takes the most powerful microscope even to see them.

In themselves these bacteria do but little harm, but many of them set free an acid which eats into the fiber of the material. If the individual fiber is coarse the deposit of the acid upon it is not enough to eat all the way through, but if it is sheer or woven of fine threads one by one the threads are eaten through and the texture weakened.

Good clothing, instead of being kept shut away in boxes and drawers, should be constantly aired and shaken. The finer the material the more often should it be looked after. A coarse piece of goods will wear out by using, a fine piece by being laid away.—New York American.

TWO TROOPERS KILLED ON LINE

Brownsville, Texas, Sept. 14.—With 4,000 United States troops on guard along the Mexican border in the lower Rio Grande valley, the entire force was held ready for instant action as a result of a carefully arranged atack by Mexicans early today on the camp of a cavalry patrol, near the river.

Although surprised and surrounded the ten troopers of Troop A, 12th United States cavalry, under Sergeant Walsh, made a spectacular defense and stood off and forced three times their number of assailants to retire.

The American soldiers lost two killed and one wounded, and while the Mexicans were seen to fall during the battle they were carried off by their comrades.

BIG CROWDS AT AT STATE FAIR TODAY

Syracuse, Sept. 14.—The State Fair began to come into its own today, the second day. From early in the morning indications were that the attendance today would be good and with fair weather the opening of the horse show, the coming of society, big races scheduled at the track, aeroplane flights, and other attractions, it promised to be a real fair today.

A hot sun worked rapidly in drying up the track and grounds and it was evident that the track would be in good condition this afternon.

The official figures today gave yesterday's attendance at 4,474. This did not include the children, however, so the total attendance was considerably more than that. A year ago the total attendance on Monday was 5,240. The rain yesterday prevented a larger attendance.

At two o'clock this afternon a crowd of at least 15,000 was estimated on the State Fair grounds. Indications were that before night the crowd would be far ahead of the 14,400 of Tuesday last year.

1. Do you believe that every voter of New York State, including those in cities and parts of cities, especially residential sections, has a right to vote and should be allowed to vote on the liquor question?

2. If your answer to the above question is "Yes," will you, if nominated and elected, by vote and influence support for that purpose the proposed Optional Prohibition Referendum Bill upon which those contending for this right are united?

3. Will you by vote and influence stand throughout for such procedure as will insure this measure being brought to a vote on its merits at the coming session?

Gains in Territory Will Not End War Says Great Writer

(By Hilaire Belloc.)

In thep resent situation of the war, after a full year of large active operations, no decision has been arrived at or even approached by either party.

There has been in that period of time an expenditure of men and munitions on a scale utterly out of keeping with all previous warfare. At the same time the political objects of either party to the struggle remain as clear as ever and the determination upon either side to attain those objects by ultimate victory is still everywhere unshaken.

It may, therefore, be presumed without rashness that the main element in our judgment of the future course of the war must be decided by man-power and not on territory occupied.

I propose to analyze the present numerical strength of the Germans and Austrians upon the following plan:

1. To find approximately the maximum number available to them for their fully armed and organized forces, as present in their service from the outbreak of the war to the end of the second year of war.

2. To-find out what the minimum permanent losses which the Austro-Germans already sustained to the end of August, 1915.

3. To strike the defference getween the first set of figures, their man power, and the second, their permanent losses, and, by comparing the remainder with the forces they must maintain upon their present fronts, tod iscover what reserve of man power for continuing their present effort still remains to them.

The number of men from seventeen to forty-five present and alive in the German Empire at the outbreak of the war was, upon the basis of the census of 1910, and, allowing for four years' increase, almost exactly 15,000,000. The corresponding number present and alive between the same ages in the Austro-Hungarian Empire was, on the basis of eighty per cent., 12,000,000. And the total for the Teutons, 27,000,000.

These very large round figures are, of course, enormously in excess of the men really available.

Men are rejected as unfit for service for a vast number of defects which would appear trivial in ordinary civilian avocations, but which would be fatal to theu se of the men affected in prolonged operations in the field.

It is often suggested that the men so rejected can still be used in the auxiliary services of an army. In point of fact this is not the case save for a very small proportion. An army must be fit to act as a whole.

Most of its auxiliary services are continuously arduous in character. Those that are not continuously arduous at times—and those times cannot be calculated beforehand—subject to very severe strain.

Were you to put, for instance, upon communications in such a campaign as that which the Teutons are now prosecuting in Poland, men unfit for active service in large numbers, you would find yourself quickly hampered with a vast mass of sick, whose presence would be a drawback quite out of proportion to the advantage their originaln umbers might have given you.

Let us next determine the maximum really available out of this 27,000,000.

The years in a man's life during which he is best fitted for service are the early twenties. The year in which a man has passed his twentieth birthday is they ear which, in all conscript countries, is chosen for the revision of the conscripts and the seggregation of them into classes of fita nd unfit.

Now, however, the sifting is performed, in practice you always get too much thes amer esult. There are always rather more than three-quarters of the young men who can at a pinch and at a maximum be used as soldiers, including many not really fit, and in practice excluded, and rather more than one-quarter who cannot possibly be used at all.

If we takea ll thea dultm ales for the twenty-eight years between seventeenth and forty-fifth birthdays, and deduct one-third (admitting for them oment that the elder men so-called are really efficient, which they are not) you have a figure which is certainly beyond the mark.

We come, then, to this: That the Austrians and Germans, counting the boys of seventeen, the men of forty-five and everything between, had a potential manpower at the outbreak of the war of 18,000,000, of which, roughly, 10,000,000 are in the German and 8,000,000 in the Austo-Hungarian part of the whole.

But this number, 18,000,000, is only a total theoretical maximum drawn on paper, satisfactory only as a piece of statistics, and vastly in excess of the real numbers available.

The French population is about one-third of that of the Teutonic allies. France should therefore be able to produce, upon the same purely arbitrary and theoretical statement, not quite 6,000,000 mobilized men. But the declaration madeb y the Minister of War in France, which was also conformable to all past and present experience, was that the actual number mobilized amounted to little more than one-tenth of the total population, that is, more than four million men.

When we are told that old figures, rules of thumb laid down in past wars to determine this proportion of men, are too large and should not be applied to thep resent war on account of "modern efficiency of organization," we reply that the exact opposite is the case.

So surely as the French theoretic siz became in practice only just over four, so s urely as the experience of every national war has invariably brought us to this figure of a tenth, or barely more than a tenth, of the total population and two-thirds more or less of the nominal efficients, so surely the 120 millions of the Central Empires will enable them, with the fullest efficiency in organization, to put a maximum of just over twelve milions into the field.

Democratic Leaders Dispute Authority of Each to Name Men

What is reputed to be the inside story of the nomination of Myron Foster, present alderman from the Fourth ward, for Mayor on the Democratic ticket, was given a reporter for The Times this morning by a local attorney who is in close touch with the local Democratic committee.

According to this man, William J. Hartnett, Democratic committeeman, and Patrick J. O'Brien, who has been recognized as one of the controlling factors in Democratic politics here, engaged in a verbal clash yesterday over the subject of nominations. Mr. Hartnett is a member of the Vacancy committee, whose business it is to fill the gaps in the ticket left by the declinations of the men first named.

Last week M. E. (Dad) Mead was named for Mayor on the Democratic ticket and Mr. Mead received the support of Mr. O'Brien in the circulation of his petition. When John Boland filed his declination to his nomination for Mayor on the Democratic ticket Mr. O'Brien immediately began a campaign circulated to swing the solid support of the party in favor of Mr. Mead, but right here, Mr. Hartnett entered the discussion.

It is stated that Mr. Hartnett insisted upon the nomination of Mr. Foster, and backed up his claims by the statement that he was empowered to make the choice because of his position on the Vacancy committee. Mr. Hartnett finally won his point but not before Mr. O'Brien made a hard fight for Mr. Mead.

Mr. Foster has had Mayoralty aspirations for some time, and he will accept the nomination. He has won many adherents by his economical ideas on the question of city expenditures and during the past six months alone he has fought hard on a number of occasions for a curtailment of expenses. His friends believe that his ideas or administration plan and his plans in regard to appointments, which are reported to be anti-organization in policy, will make him the strongest candidate the party could have selected, not excepting Mr. Boland, and predict that he will carry the city by a large majority.

LAUNDRY EMPLOYES FELT HEAT KEENLY

The heat wave which was felt all over the East yesterday caused no fatalities in Fulton, but in several factories a few of the women employes were obliged to suspend work for the day. At McIntyre's laundry in 6th st., the employes, mostly women, had to seek respite from the excessive heat by frequent trips to the outside air. At different times during the afternoon the entire force was obliged to leave the laundry and seek what comfort they could in the shade outside. One employe, fearing prostration, went home.

PAST STATE HEAD OF EASTERN STAR DIES

Rochester, Sept. 15.—Mrs. Jessie M. Ray, past grand matron of the Order of the Eastern Star of New York State, died last evening at six o'clock at her home here.

Mrs. Ray was always an active worker in the Order of the Eastern Star. Besides being past grand matron of this state, she is past matron and a life member of Monroe Chapter, organizer, life member and past matron of Ray-Diant Court, Order of the Amaranth, and first president of the Royal Matrons' Association.

DEATH OF POLISH INFANT.

Audolph Brzuchaz, 6 months old, son of Mr. and Mrs. Bronislaw Brzuchaz, of 152 West 1st st., died yesterday at the family home. Funeral services were held this morning at the Church of the Immaculate Conception and burial was made in St. Mary's cemetery. Rev. J. L. Lindsman officiated.

COFFERDAM WITHSTANDS TREMENDOUS PRESSURE; WALL MADE STRONGER

A rumor that a section of the cofferdam at the upper bridge had been washed out last night spread about town today. Mr. Shafer, foreman of the construction work denies that any part of the dam had broken. He stated, however, that due to a rapid rise of three feet in the river, emergency measures were resorted to which gave rise to the rumor that a thirty-foot section of the dam hadb urst. This afternoon extra efforts were being made to strengthen thed am, three thousand bags of sand having been instantly ordered. Most of this ballast has been put in place and the entire force of men is engaged in carrying the bags to the weak spots.

Last fall the Bradley Construction Company had the experience of a coffer dam breaking and flooding their construction work at Minetto, doing thousands of dollars worth of damage. It is estimated that $25,000 would not cover the damage if the present contract were affected in a like manner.

Mr. Shafer stated this afternoon that the depth of the river, when the work on the coffer dam was first started, was 7 feet, and that the engineering principle would call for he construction of a dam of 7 feet in width. However, to guard against any future contingencies, the dam was made 12 feet wide. This would take care of a rise in the river of 5 feet. Mr. Shafer stated further that when the six gates in the upper dam were opened last night the sudden inflow of water caused a wave which washed over the coffer dam in several places without doing any damage. The only thing which would cause the dam to break, the foreman mentioned, would be an overflow of water over the dam, which is constructed of sand reinforced by planking, and washing the mass steadily away. Notwithstanding that the dam at present is considered high and wide enough for safety, no chances will be taken and the company will continue to strengthen the dam throughout its length.

Opinions

FISHING FOR PUBLIC NOTICE.

Mr. Bryan's "willingness to go to Europe and attempt to bring about peace" indicates that he is growing tired of the comparative obscurity in which he has existed since he retired from the Department of State, and that he is eager to secure public attention. His offer will not improsse the public as being a matter of the first importance, even though he is prepared to go so far as to pay his own expenses. A fly on the hub of a touring car speeding across the country at at rate of sixty miles an hour would stand as much chance of securing a hearing in the interest of "safety first" as Mr. Bryan would of persuading the war-crazed nations of Europe to stop the dreadful work of slaughter.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

"ELIHU ROOT, PROGRESSIVE."

Elihu Root has unmistakably earned the title of a Progressive. When Frederick M. Davenport writes a magazine article on "Elihu Root—Progressive," it need no longer be doubted that the former senator is being generally recognized as such. Davenport is no longer a Progressive, so far as actual party membership goes. He has returned to the Republican fold, it is understood. And with his return to the Republican fold he has sent Elihu Root to the Progressive classification. It is a transfer that all but makes one's head swim.

Prof. Davenport writes an interesting article in the current issue of the Independent in which he praises Mr. Root's Progressiveism as set forth in his address recently before the constitutional convention. Prof. Davenport takes occasion to discuss the new constitution and Mr. Root jointly and he says:

"The remarkable thing about New York is that so much more is accomplished than anybody imagined possible in the rather depressed state of the public mind with respect to progress and reform throughout the Union. In New York the event has been made notable noto nly by the extraordinary speech of Senator Root, but by the moral conviction with which he has gone about his work, and the extraordinary sympathy with the new age and with the opinions of the young men of his party and of the nation with this statesman of 70 years has shown in this convention."

Prof. Davenport will find that, after all, he and his erstwhile followers are not so far removed in their beliefs from those of Elihu Root and his school as it stands in 1915. It is to be admitted and regreted that Mr. Root's change has come late, but it is so with many others who are expressing opinions today far different from those of a few years ago. With Prof. Davenport praising Elihu Root and Elihu Root preaching against the evils of partisanship there seems hope for a reunited Republican party.—Watertown Times.

RESULT OF NOT THINKING

Most of the tragedies and most of t he errors of life and of business are committed by people who "did not think."

We speak harshly of men and women and organizations without thinking. We question the motives of men and the way they conduct their business without thinking. Too often we take the wrong road in reform work without thinking; and, who has not seen money squandered by those who "did not think." Thinking occurs after the money has been squandered.

In reviewing the work of an organization composed of men who have at heart the city's best interests, we work ourselves up to a pitch of excitement which results in taking on a grouch against anything and everything and not very much after all in particular. We think we are looking at both sides of a question, when along comes a person to tell us that we have committed ourselves to a position—because we "did not think."

In the present fight for Commission-Manager form of government we find men who think they have thought out a few reasons why a change should not be made. They pick flaws with the organization through whose influence the plan to make a change has come—because they refuse to think that the organization is but the channel through which a majority of the people of this city have expressed themselves in favor of a more advanced form of government; and further, that the men comprising the Chamber of Commerce are human beings—like themselves, given to error, and only error.

On the other hand, we have the men who, knowing of the errors of the class of persons specified, also stumble. They see but one side of the question and are too narrow to credit to their opponents the ability to think; and, what is more to the point, they hold to their eyes a veil through which it is impossible to see that if a public question is worth its weight, it should have light from all angles turned upon it. They do not seem to think that their opponents should be accorded the privilege of airing in a public medium their views pro and con on something of vital importance to themselves and their neighbors. In their failure to think capably and rightly they squeeze themselves through a crack of the same size as the one through which their opponents peer, with the result that they work up a grouch and direct it against what is recognized as the proper American debating ground—the medium and the channel for public discussion—the Public Press.

After all, what causes all the commotion? Does not the cause lie in the failure of each of us to think? The Evening Times answers the question, Yes, a thousand of times, Yes. How often we think we are thinking and do something later to be regretted. Why is this statement true? It is because we lack information, and lacking it, we fail to accord to others the right to point to error and the right to give true information.

In laying claim to being the people's paper, The Evening Times reiterates a position taken nine months ago—that it is "the spokesman of the man in the street, the woman in the house, the girl who meets her necessities through daily toil." That is what a newspaper should be and it is the principle invoked by the publisher and any attempt on the part of any person or persons to curtail or deprive unreasonably the people of such a medium is an evidence of lack of information and, subsequently, error.

Secretary Daniels of the Navy used to help his widowed mother tend the post office, which paid her $200 a year. Beside this, he sold newspapers, and the two got on fine.

The first money earned by Woodrow Wilson, our President, was for a "weekly" article, for a magazine, and the President says the magazine went out of existence almost immediately after the article appeared.

William Jennings Bryan got 50c. a day in hayin', when he was a boy.

Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, began at $3 a week as a clerk in a store. Mr. Lane believes that a poor boy has the advantage of hard work. The poor boy has no opportunity for indulgence. He claims the rich boy knows the glamour and the temptation. He insists that poverty is a great character-builder—that the habit of work must be cultivated, and the ground is more fertile where necessities drive.

The great "Empire Builder," Mr. James J. Hill, began as a farmer's boy, and graduated to a coal shoveler. Mr. Hill insists that the door of opportunity is wide open to the young men of America, if they will but remember that luck and laziness do not go together. Mr. Hill points to five executives on the Pennsylvania Railroad that began as messenger boys.—The Silent Partner.

A Dollar That Can't Be Spent

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

EVERY dollar spent in advertising is not only a seed dollar which produces a profit for the merchant, but is actually retained by him even after he has paid it to the publisher.

Advertising creates a good will equal to the cost of the publicity.

Advertising really costs nothing. While it uses funds it does not use them up. It helps the founder of a business to grow rich and then keeps his business alive after his death.

It eliminates the personal equation. It perpetuates confidence in the store and makes it possible for a merchant to withdraw from business without having the profits of the business withdrawn from him. It changes a name to an institution—an institution which will survive its builder.

It is really an insurance policy which costs nothing—pays a premium each year instead of calling for one and renders it possible to change the entire personnel of a business without disturbing its prosperity.

Advertising renders the business stronger than the man—independent of his presence. It permanentizes systems of merchandising, the track of which is left for others to follow.

A business which is not advertised must rely upon the personality of its proprietor, and personality in business is a decreasing factor. The public does not want to know the man who owns the store—it isn't interested in him but in his goods. When an unadvertised business is sold it is only worth as much as its stock of goods and its fixtures. There is no good will to be paid for—it does not exist—it has not been created. The name over the door means nothing except to the limited stream of people from the immediate neighborhood, any of whom could tell you more about some store ten miles away which has regularly delivered its shop news to their homes.

It is as shortsighted for a man to build a business which dies with his death or ceases with his inaction, as it is unfair for him not to provide for the continuance of its income to his family.

DR. LIBERTY HYDE WANTS BETTER FARMS

Albany, Sept. 15.—Strong arguments for better standards of farm sanitation are presented in the current number of the Health News, the official publication of the State Department of Health, by Dr. Liberty Hyde Bailey, former director of the College of Agriculture, Cornell University.

"Good soil, good seed, good animals, good tools, good men, there are the foundation of a good agriculture and a good country life," says Dr. Bailey. "We have been taught very much in these latter years about the first four of these—the soil, how to know it and how to treat it, with bulletins in much detail; the seed—there are professors of plant breeding and there is no end of good advice from the institutions; the animals—exhibitions have been held, feeding tests have been made, diseases putu nder control, books and books have been written about them, every farmer thinks he knows a good cow and a good horse; the tools and machines—farming would now be impossible without them and many persons are making careful experiments with machines of various types.

"We do not find the same kind of attention given by the institutions to men and women, that they may be well born, well reared, well fed, with sound teeth, stomachs that will carry them through life, lungs that will provide the power; and yet the effectiveness of soil and seed, of animals and machines, all depend on the man to do his part and on the woman tod o her part.

"We now recognize it to be a part of community action to look after the health of all those who comprise the community. A man cannot have mumps unto himself. Every sick man or woman or child lowers the economic efficiency of a community or neighborhood; many persons feel the effects and the weight of it; it is just as much our obligation to try to overcome this disadvantage as to meet any other disadvantage, and even more so, seeing that all men are kin. The old pride that some of us used to have in being ill is out of place in this latter day world; new we search for the cause and try to place the responsibility."

Good Paint

is cheap; and Devoe is not the only good paint; it is one of a dozen; and, very likely, the only one in your town—there are hundreds of middling and bad.

You can see what chance there is of another good one there: perhaps one in ten at the most.

Bad paint is dearest; middling is dear; costs 2 or 3 times as much as the best.

No matter about the cost a gallon; that isn't it; the cost a square foot; the cost a job; better yet, the cost a year.

There's a whole education in paint in this advertisement.

COMMUNITY ENTERPRISE AT A COUNTY FAIR

The Grange News Letter says:

A fine bit of community enterprise was recently exhibited by the people of Chatham, Col. Co. in advertising the county fair held at that place on Sept. 6 to 10. The Auto club of the village turned out about 15 cars which were divided into two companies each preceded by a band. These taking different routes covered the county, one pleasant day, with banners flying advertising the forthcoming fair. The party stopped at each village where the bands played and advertising matter was distributed. The two companies met at a designated place and then the combined parade drove through the city of Hudson and from there returned to Chatham. The county fair is the great event of the season here and it will be greater than ever this year. Everybody boosts the fair.

NEARLY ONE MILLION RAISED FOR SUFFERERS

New York, Sept. 15.—The latest financial report of the American Jewish Committee for Sufferers from the war, No. 173 Second avenue, of which Mr. Felix M. Warburg, No. 52 William st., is treasurer, shows that contributions to date amount to $929,238.38. This sum has been expended as follows:

To Russia, $455,000; to German Poland, $195,000; to Austria-Hungary, $85,000; to Swiss University students, $2,500; to Jews at Salonica, $5,000; to Jews at Aleppo, 2,500; to Jews of Monastir, $3,000; to Jews of Gallipoli and Dardanelles, $2,500; to Rabbi Meir for relief in Uskub and Ischtip, $1,000; to Palestine, $25,000; for stocking Vulcan with foodstuffs, medicines for offices of treasurer, secretary and propaganda committies, $12,470.47; balance on hand, $55,640.10.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Address: F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. Sold by druggists, 75c.

Ginseng In China.

For many years past foreign doctors in China have endeavored to convince the Chinese that there is little or no virtue in ginseng as a remedy beyond its having a slight tonic quality. But, although they have been successful in introducing foreign drugs and medicines, they have failed to reduce the use of ginseng, as the Chinese still have great faith in it.

WITH STATE EDITORS.

There is little promise of retrenchment in government expenses under the present Democratic administration. Already, in anticipation of the meeting of Congress, heads of departments are beginning to tell how much money they will want. When out of power the party makes all kinds of charges of extravagance. When it gets into power it proceeds to pile up the expenses.—Troy Times.

One very encouraging sign of Republican progress is the increased enrollment of voters this year over the enrollment for 1914. The figures for the two years are 7,283 and 9,061, showing that 1,778 more names are enrolled under the G. O. P. emblem this year than the year before, an increase of 25 per cent. The Democratic enrollment was increased only 5 per cent., while the Progressive lost 26 per cent. The prospects are bright for Republican success. Of the 19,113 registered voters in Dutchess county it is assumed that only 17,000 or 17,500 will vote. As 9,000 of these are enrolled Republicans it is clear that with persistent effort to get out the vote victory will perch upon the party banner next November.—Poughkeepsie Evening Star.

Democratic writers are assigning reasons why William Sulzer is opposing Alfred E. Smith's candidacy for Sheriff of New York. Dear old Bill has a long memory and has not forgotten that Smith, as Speaker of the Assembly, played a conspicuous part in the preparation of certain articles of impeachment. And Bill has never been particularly recognized as the possessor of a sublimely forgiving disposition.—Gloversville Leader-Republican.

Coughs That Are Stopped

Careful people see that they are stopped. Dr. King's New Discovery is a remedy of tried merit. It has held its own on the market for 46 years. Youth and old age testify to its soothing and healing qualities. Pneumonia and lung troubles are often caused by delay of treatment. Dr. King's New Discovery stops those hacking coughs and relieves la grippe tendencies. Money back if it fails. 50c and $1.00.

AT THE QUIRK.

Matinee and night, Friday, September 17, the beautiful and realistic scenes which have made Earl Burgess' production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" world-famous, are a little cabin of Uncle Tom, an old Southern road, Skinner's Tavern, the ice gorged Ohio river by moonlight, the grand old home of Phineas Friend, the wild rocky pass in Southern Ohio, St. Claire's home showing a tropical garden with its fragrant magnolia and orange trees, among which nestles the typical Southern plantation residence, the home of Eva, Corridor at St. Claire's, the great New Orleans levee and slave mart, a moss-circled road near Legree's, a street in New Orleans, Legree's plantation on the Red river with the cotton in full bloom, and the transformation entitled "The Celectial City." Mr. Burgess' version involves thirty important characters and is told in four acts and twenty-eight scenes. Negroes are carried to fill out the pictures and introduce their plantation pastimes. The production is transported by special train.

ENGLAND'S THRONE.

In One of the Heirs to It, the German Emperor Is Very Remote.

In answer to the question, "Was the emperor of Germany ever considered an heir to the English throne and did Queen Victoria have a law passed to exclude him from the succession?" the Philadelphia Press says:

"The possibility of the German emperor ever succeeding to the throne of England is so very remote as to cause little thought. There was more or less talk on the subject at the time of the marriage of the kaiser's mother to the heir to the German throne in 1858, but we are unable to find that any parliamentary action was taken even then.

"After King George come his five sons and one daughter and their children, if any; then King George's sister Louise, Duchess of Fife, her two daughters and the son of the eldest; then Princess Victoria, then Queen Maud of Norway and her son, making thirteen at present living in the line of succession. After that the succession reverts to the descendants of the late King Edward's brother, Alfred, duke of Edinburgh; Arthur, duke of Connaught, and Leopold, duke of Albany. As these all married and had numerous children and grandchildren, there is a long line of heirs to the throne before the succession would come to the descendants of the eldest sister of King Edward, the late Empress Frederick of Germany, the first of which line is Emperor William."

YESTERDAY'S TROPICAL HEAT FAILED TO KEEP FULTON PEOPLE AT HOME

Fully 200 Fultonians attended the State Fair at Syracuse yesterday and the consensus of opinion seems to be that the event surpasses those of previous years in every respect. The intense heat of yesterday (at 3 o'clock the thermometer registered 108 in the sun) had no adverse effect upon the attendance.

The horser acing drew the attention of most of the Fulton visitors and the performance of Joe Patchen III, the speedy little Canastota pacer, who took the measure of John W. Stevenson's Michigan King, at the fair here and won almost every event in which he has been entered this season, was awtched with keen interest. Joe Patchen took fourth honors in the 2:14 pace on his initial appearance in Grand Circuit yesterday.

The exhibits this year are large and comprehensive and the poultry show, cattle show, horse and dog shows are arousing great interest. George E. Moore of this city, has an entry in the class for bull dogs and several local people have listed entries in the paultry show.

DONT MIX WITH MEN SAYS MRS. BELMONT

San Francisco. Sept. 14.—Urging her hearers to forego alliances with any existing man's political party and to work for a new woman-made civilization, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, of New York, as general chairman of the women voters' convention, welcomed the delegates at a luncheon today which preceded the first business session of the convention. Mrs. Belmont said:

"The woman voters of the twelve enfranchised states of our United States are here to form a body politic. It is the first time in the history of the world that women have moved politically. What does it signify?

"It means now, as it always has and alwaysw ill, that when women come together to work, the moral, better side of humanity intends to assert itself.

"The western woman with the power of her ballot will give to her enslaved sister justice and freedom.

"The union of this sisterhood of women voters is the power politically of the near future. Let us plead with you to form no alliance with any existing man's political party. For twenty centuries, remember, you have been led to believe your work was to patch up the evils germinated by man's so-called civilization. It is time for us women to have a civilization of our own.

"Let us create a new code of honor, a different standard of morals."

ALBANY GOSSIP DAY BY DAY

Chronicle of Events and a Forecast of What is Doing in Officialdom---Specia Correspondence.

By Frederic T. Cardoze.

Albany, Sept. 15.—Perhaps one of the most formidable bones of contention over which the Republicans and Democrats fought during the duration of the Constitutional Convention was the proposed amendment affecting a legislative re-apportionment.

It has ever been the claim of New York City Democrats, and in some instances of Republicans as well, that Greater New York withi ts majority of population should be given the balance of power in the lawmaking body, or at least if not in both houses, in the Senate. This proposition the up-State members opposed. The opposition was based upon the disinclination to permit a single copy to dominate the remaining municipalities.

The delegates to the convention finally adopted a re-apportionment plan, but it was considerably compromised, the Democrats being denied their desire to be given the majority of members in at least one legislative house.

The amendment in question, upon which the voters of the entire State will be called upon to consider this November. Its main feature provides for a re-apportionment of the senatorial districts by the legislature of 1916. The next language of the proposed amendment in this respect follows:

"Such senate districts shall be so altered by the legislature at the first regular session after the return of and based upon the State enumeration taken in the year 1915 and shall remain unaltered as hereinafter provided. At the regular session of the legislature in the year after the tabulation of each federal census the senate districts shall be altered by the legislature. Senate districts altered as herein provided shall remainu naltered until the time herein appointed for another alteration. Provided, however, that if a federal census shalln ot be available for any such alteration the same shall be based upon an enumeration of the inhabitants of the State, excluding aliens, and the legislature shall provide for such an enumeration for that purpose."

Another section of the proposed amendment provides as follows:

"At the regular session of thel egislature in each year in which senate districts shall be altered such members of thea ssembly shall again be apportioned by the legislature. Apportionments of members of assembly shall remain unaltered until the time herein appointed for another apportion ment thereof. Every apportionment of members among the several counties of the State shall be as nearly as may be according to the number of their respective inhabitants, excluding aliens."

It is provided in the proposed amendment also that the assembly districts as at present constituted shall remain unaltered as herein provided."

Those who attended the sessions of the Constitutional Convention when the re-apportionment proposition was being debated will recall that the declaration was frequently made, that New York City should be treated like all other cities and be given a representation in accordance with its populationa nd that irrespective of the fact that it would thus have a majority in both houses of the legislature, such a concession should be made. This contention up-State delegates met with the argument that it were better to leave the balance of power divided among the various cities than surrender it to the metropolis.

The proposition was amended three successive times and was finally reported in its present form by the committee on Legislative Organization.

Resigned to It.

Taking oneself too seriously is supposed to be an American trait. At any rate, it is found in America. The late Edward Everett Hale in "We, the People," cites a remark of Thomas Carlyle apropos of this habit.

Margaret Fuller had perhaps taken herself the least bit too seriously. She had said that she had determined "to accept the universe"

"She had better," said Carlyle.

Widow With Live Husband.

When an otherwise industrious, God-fearing and considerate head of a family makes up his mind to go in for politics his wife would just as well make up her mind that she is going to have a touch of the experience of being a widow with a live husband.—Houston Post.

LOCAL BUSINESS MAN'S ENGAGEMENT ANNOUNCED

The engagement of Joseph H. Bennett of this city to Miss Ruby Bischoff of New York City has been announced. Miss Bischaff is a talented young woman who will be welcomed in local circles. Mr. Bennett is a genial young business man and is receiving a shower of congratulations.

A Disguised Compliment.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the eminent musical composer, while traveling in Canada some time ago, had an amusing and remarkable experience. Suddenly his train pulled up at a little way side station, and he and the other passengers were told that something was wrong on the line and that they must wait at least nine hours.

"Nine hours in this hole of a place!" exclaimed Sir Alexander. "Away from all civilization! How I hate its very name! What is its name, by the way?"

Putting his head out of the carriage window, he saw on a board in front of him the name of the despised station in large letters. It was "Mackenzie!"

Italy's Flag.

The Italian national flag is a tricolor composed of green, white and red stripes, with a crown and shield worked into the white portion. It closely resembles the tricolor of France and was intentionally designed with that end in view. Napoleon, when he controlled the destinies of Italy, originated the green, white and red banner so that it should indicate by its close resemblance to the national flag of France the source to which it owed its existence.

FAREWELL TO PASTOR RESULTED IN WEDDING

The membership of the Free Methodist church met at the parsonage on Monday evening to say farewell to the Rev. C. C. Watson, the pastor, and the members of his family. Refreshments were served and a brief musical program embraced some singing by Mrs. Watson, who as well made an address.

The surprise of the evening came when the pastor announced that a wedding would take place, to be witnessed by every guest, the contracting parties being Mr. Charles Rudd and Miss Lucy Ward, both of this city. Mr. and Mrs. Rudd have taken up their residence in East Broadway.

How to Write Advertising Copy

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

A SKILLED layer of mosaic works with small fragments of stone—they fit into more places than the larger chunks.

The skilled advertiser works with small words—they fit into more minds than big phrases.

The simpler the language the greater certainty that it will be understood by the least intelligent reader.

The construction engineer plans his roadbed where there is a minimum of grade—he works along the lines of least resistance.

The advertisement which runs into mountainous style is badly surveyed—all minds are not built for high grade thinking.

Advertising must be simple. When it is tricked out with the jewelry and silks of literary expression, it looks as much out of place as a ball dress at the breakfast table!

The buying public is only interested in facts. People read advertisements to find out what you have to sell.

The advertiser who can fire the most facts in the shortest time gets the most returns. Blank cartridges make noise but they do not hit—blank talk, however clever, is only wasted space.

You force your salesmen to keep to solid facts—you don't allow them to sell muslin with quotations from Omar or trousers with excerpts from Marie Corelli. You must not tolerate in your printed selling talk anything that you are not willing to countenance in personal salesmanship.

Cut out clever phrases if they are inserted to the sacrifice of clear explanations—write copy as you talk. Only be more brief. Publicity is costlier than conversation—ranging in price downward from $10 a line; talk is not cheap, but the most expensive commodity in the world.

Sketch in your ad to the stenographer. Then you will be so busy "saying it" that you will not have time to bother about the gewgaws of writing. Afterwards take the typewriten manuscript and cut out every word and every line that can be erased without omitting an important detail. What remains in the end is all that really counted in the beginning.

Cultivate brevity and simplicity. "Savon Français" may look smarter, but more people will understand "French Soap." Sir Isaac Newton's explanation of gravitation covers six pages but the schoolboy's terse and homely "What goes up must come down" clinches the whole thing in six words.

Indefinite talk wastes space. It is not 100% productive. The copy that omits prices sacrifices half its pulling power—it has a tendency to bring lookers instead of buyers. It often creates false impressions. Some people are bound to conceive the idea that the goods are higher priced than in reality—others, by the same token, are just as likely to infer that the prices are lower and go away thinking that you have exaggerated your statements.

The reader must be searched out by the copy. Big space is cheapest because it doesn't waste a single eye. Publicity must be on the offensive. There are far too many advertisers who keep their lights on top of their bushel—the average citizen hasn't time to overturn your bushel.

Small space is expensive. Like a one-flake snowstorm, there is not enough of it to lay.

Space is a comparative matter after all. It is not a case of how much is used but how it is used. The passengers on the limited express may realize that Jones has tacked a twelve-inch shingle on every post and fence for a stretch of five miles, but they are going too fast to make out what the shingles say, yet the two-feet letters of Brown's big bulletin board on top of the hill leap at them before they have a chance to dodge it. And at that it doesn't cost nearly so much as the sum total of Jones' dinky display.

Just so advertisements attractively displayed every day or every week for a year in one newspaper will find the eye of all readers, no matter how rapidly they may be "going" through the advertising pages, and produce more results than a dozen piking pieces of copy scattered through half a dozen papers.

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

Ambrose Peale, press agent, meets Rodney and agrees to go into business with the lad on a salary basis. Rodney has resolved to go into the soap industry and buck the trust.

Rodney, Peale and Mary go into the soap trade together. Rodney then endeavors to borrow $10,000 as capital for his newly formed company.

was that kit bag? Johnson would know.

He started to ring for Johnson and then checked himself. He would not say anything to the servants yet. He didn't want them to be a party to this painful scene. He would leave them misinformed and keep his father guessing a little while. He would go and get that kit bag himself. It was in the garret most likely.

He had sneaked up the narrow garret staircase, the boards creaking now and then beneath his tread, just as they used to do when he was a child. Under the eaves he spied his kit bag, covered with dust. He dragged at it, and a pile of magazines and odds and ends of books fell forward across his arms. One of them was a battered cash book, or old diary, bound with a black and white back, and with many recipes written in a refined feminine hand on its blank pages.

Rodney remembered this well. It was a real heirloom from the Earles, his mother's people, who had prided themselves on "setting a good table." Rodney sat down on his dusty kit bag and turned over the yellowing pages idly. Some of the recipes were in an even older hand than his mother's—his grandmother's or his maiden aunts' probably—and now and then, in his mother's hand again, there would be a comment written in the margin, "Very choice" or "Extra good" or "Well worth trying." The recipes for these tasty old dishes looked good. Rodney decided to tuck the book in with his own things, a venial theft, and put it by some day for himself and Mary.

They certainly did sound good. "Old Farrington meat pie," "Hannah Earle's gold and silver cake," "Susan Pitcher's everlasting fruit cake." Yes, he would take it. And here was a formula even for soap, and in his mother's hand or his grandmother's, he could not be sure which, was the quaint marginal note: "The cheapest soap in the world. Unlucky for dirt." And so he had pitched the old book into the bag, stolen down the attic stairs again and bounded, dusty kit bag and all, into the little waiting room where Mary sat.

Dear Mary!

And she had let him hug her—the first taste of the bliss to come. How sweet and wonderful she was!

When he woke in the morning he rubbed his eyes a moment in bewilderment at his unaccustomed surroundings. And immediately the memory of Mary Grayson swept over him again, fresh and undimmed. He would call up Mary on the telephone before she got away to the office. And, by the way, he had an idea to tell her too. He was going to make soap, like his father. The old cook book had given him the idea. He left his coffee scarcely tasted and flew to a booth at the club.

"Well, Mary," he shouted through the receiver, which smelt of cigarettes, "did you know I'd lost my job?"

"Yes," said Mary's voice at a distance. "I suppose I shall lose mine, too, if I don't give you up."

"We should be friends in need, then," drawled Rodney at his end.

"Oh, Rodney, I'm so sorry," said Mary.

"Nonsense, you've made my future. Without you I'd never have got the idea—the big idea."

"Idea for what?"

"The idea to make money out of—that's all you need—and, just think, I found it in an old book"—

"What idea—what book?"

"It's a cook book."

"What on earth"—

"Well, you see, when I was packing I stumbled across an old family cook book. It fell open at a certain page [illegible]

"But what is it?"

"It's an old family recipe for making cheap soap. It says it's the cheapest soap in the world, cheaper even then the manufacturers make it. I'm going into the soap business."

"What?"

"Sure—father did—look at the money he made. Why shouldn't I?"

"You're joking."

"I'm in dead earnest. I'm going to buck the trust. You see, I'll have all the popular sympathy—independent young son of soap king fights father—don't buy from the trust."

"But is that very nice to your father?"

"Has he been very nice to me? It's great! Down with monopoly! Hurrah for the people! I've heard political speeches like that! Hurrah for the people's soap! That isn't a bad name either—the people's soap!"

"But you haven't any capital."

"I never thought of that."

"You'd need a lot of money too."

"Well," Rodney said, "well, I'll just have to get it, that's all, and you'll be my secretary."

"Rodney, you must stop talking or you'll go stony broke with this long call!" yelled Mary.

"Well, when can I see you again?" Rodney persisted.

"I shall be at the office till 3," said Mary.

"I'll drop in. Father may be home with the gout," Rodney answered.

Rodney hung up the receiver and turned away reluctantly. Mary's voice—wasn't it the most wonderful voice in the world? He took out a cigarette and lit it, finding a quiet seat near the Forty-fourth street window to sit down and think things over.

He armed himself with a newspaper, so that he could occasionally hold it up and ward off unwelcome chatterers who might disturb his train of thought. The armament was not modern enough, however, to repel the attack of the alert young man who presently came and peered over the top of his paper.

"Well, Ambrose Peale," said Rodney, looking up.

"That's me absolutely," said Mr. Peale. "The same at your service. So you remember me, eh?"

The sight of Peale's keen and eager face took Rodney back two years at a jump. The two boys had met one night in the lobby of a Boston theater.

"Well, Mary, did you know I'd lost my job?"

The occasion had been an egg fight, not between Rodney and Ambrose Peale, but between the audience and the stage. It had been a very lively and savory affair indeed, quite efficiently carried through by the college students scattered out in front.

It had been a college play and had seemed to the student observers of it so lacking in verisimilitude that they had set up a counter demonstration in front to show probably what real college life was like. Rodney had not thrown any eggs himself, because he had forgotten to bring any with him, a circumstance which was the saving of him, for it had been noted by Peale, the manager of the piece, and brought him to the rescue. Peale had been very decent to him and kept him out of jail, thereby saving him numerous cuts, unlike the other fellows who had been duly haled before the dean and suspended, besides figuring in the headlines of the Boston papers.

Mr. Peale vowed he had been looking for Rodney for a week, but with no success.

"Very mysterious about you up on the avenue yesterday," he said. "What's up?"

"Just a little family row," said Rodney. "What's [illegible] of Broadway?' Great show, great girls, great cast."

"Oh, are you an actor?" asked Rodney carelessly.

"An actor? I should say not," said Peale scornfully. "I'm a press agent."

"Oh, I see!" said Rodney.

"But say," rattled Peale; "be sure to catch that show. It may leave town soon—out of town bookings, you know—but remember the name, 'Belle of Broadway.'"

"I've heard of it," said Rodney.

"Well, if you'll excuse me, I've been looking for you to talk business with you. Shall I blaze away?" asked Peale.

"Business? Surely, surely," rejoined Rodney, with an inward wink. "I'm a business man now. Blaze away, as you say."

"Well, well," said Peale reminiscently, "I could see at once you weren't an egg thrower, but I wouldn't have blamed you anyhow. It was a rotten show."

"Like the eggs?" put in Rodney, smiling.

"Absolutely," said Peale. "Now, I'm not much on handing myself flowers across the footlights, but do you happen to remember what I did for you?"

"You fixed things up with the chief of police," said Rodney, "and kept me from being expelled."

"And you said any time you could do anything for me"—

"That's still true," said Rodney.

"You're immense, son. Now, it's this way—have a chair—between you and me 'The Belle of Broadway' is an awful thing. Business gone to pot—something's got to be done. That's my business with you."

"With me?" said Rodney.

"You've got an aeroplane, haven't you?" inquired Peale plaintively.

"Yes—but"— began Rodney. "Let's go upstairs then," he added as an afterthought.

He knew Peale of old and that if he got started there was nothing that could hush his voice for other members. In the big room in the Forty-fourth street side upstairs they would be unmolested at this hour of the morning. Peale followed him in a docile manner.

"Then everything's all right," said Peale eagerly. "Now, you abduct the leading lady—Julia Clark—tomorrow night in your aeroplane—elope with her."

"What?"

"Sure! Some stunt too. Never been done. Julia's all for it. She's game for any press gag"—

"But I couldn't do such a thing as that," protested Rodney.

"Certainly you can," said Peale. "I'm telling you Julia 'll stand for it—a bird of a story. Why, you're up in the air with the leading lady. The next night standing room only to catch a look at the girl you're stuck on. I can see the headlines now, 'Soap King's Son Takes New Star Among the Stars With Flashlights.'"

"But it's out of the question," said Rodney. "I wouldn't do it, that's all. I'm not backing down from helping you, but there's some one who might object."

"A girl?" asked Peale acutely.

Rodney nodded.

"I guess it's cold," Peale concluded. "Girls are funny about their beaux doing a little innocent think like eloping with some other girl."

"Why don't you try somebody else?" suggested Rodney.

"I have! You were my last card. Well, I'm fired!" said Peale, with an air of finality.

It was a stunt that would have kept things going, he protested, but now—well, the show was so bad that people wouldn't even go to see it on a pass. They would have to close Saturday, and as for Ambrose Peale, he was out. Rodney did not believe that an obvious faked up lie like that would have done any good, he said. He'd feel very uncomfortable at not being able to oblige an old friend otherwise.

"I know it's advertising," he said, "but"—

"You bet it's advertising," began Peale, warming up. "What made the leading actresses? Advertising."

"But that sort of advertising can't be of real value," said Rodney negligently.

"Oh, you're one of those wise guys who don't believe in advertising, are you?" said Peale, expostulating and expounding. "Now, don't get me talking advertising. That's where I live, where I have my town house and country estate, my yachts and motors. That's my home. Maybe you think love is important. Piffle! Advertising, my boy; the power of suggestion, the psychology of print. Some old gink, a professor of psychology, showed forty Vassar girls the other day two samples of satin, one blue, one pink, same grade, same value, same artistic worth. One he described as a delicate warm [illegible]; the other he called a faded [illegible] asked them by choosing [illegible]

FROM CLODHOPPER TO KING

A Story of Feudal Times

By F. A. MITCHEL

During feudal times there was on the continent of Europe a kingdom called Apulia, which had for so many years been at war with its neighbor kingdoms that it was not possible for its sovereigns to intermarry with theirs. The consequence was that, since the Apulian kings were permitted by law to marry only those of royal blood, they intermarried among their own relatives.

There came a time when the royal blood had well nigh run out, and when King Caspar II., who had only one child, a daughter, to succeed him and looked about for a husband for her, he found not one man among his numerous relatives who was fitted for the position of the royal consort. He at once ordered the heralds to examine the royal family records with a view to hunting up some man of remote relationship who would serve the purpose.

The heralds went to a tower where the records of the early Apulian kings were kept and searched back to a time when the kingdom was a Roman province. To their surprise they found that a youth was living whose ancestor was a former king of Apulia. This king had been supplanted by his younger brother, the progenitor of King Caspar. The searchers immediately made known to the king that they had found the true heir to the throne, Caspar himself being a usurper. His majesty warned them under penalty of losing their heads to keep the secret and at once ordered his chamberlain to make inquiries as to the man whose royal pedigree had been unearthed.

He was named Rudolf Kantzler, the latter being the family name of the dynasty in possession of the Apulian throne. But the family names of kings are not in common use, and the young man did not know that he had the same name as his sovereign. Indeed, he did not even know that he was a relative of the king, much less that he was the legitimate sovereign.

Rudolf was a raiser of cabbages and other vegetables for the market. He was a worthy youth, but without education. His age was eighteen, and he had been brought up a clodhopper. Nevertheless the king resolved to marry him to the princess.

The Crown Princess Xenia was fifteen years old. When informed by her father of the situation she was very docile, and the king had great hopes of having no difficulty so far as she was concerned in arranging the marriage. He told her that he would bring Rudolf to the palace as a page, so that he might acquire at least a veneering of refinement, but that he must know nothing of the honor intended for him.

The princess listened to all that was said to her without saying a word in reply. She was altogether too young to consider the necessities of the case, and her mind was occupied in wondering what her future husband was like. She was aware that there is a great difference between a prince and a clodhopper, and a shade of anxiety crossed her young face. But that was all the expression of dissatisfaction that escaped her and was not noticed by her father.

One day when Rudolf was working among his cabbages—he worked the farm for his mother—a messenger wearing the royal livery rode up to him and told him that he had been appointed a page at the palace. Rudolf, astonished, leaned on his hoe and for a time seemed to have lost speech; then, suddenly turning again to his work, he said:

"No; I will not go to the palace to be a page. My place is here with my mother."

Such response had neither been anticipated nor provided for, so the messenger returned and reported it. Xenia was with her father at the time, and when he ordered the messenger to command Rudolf's presence at the palace she asked permission to go along that she might see her future husband. It occurred to the king that in the present case persuasion would be better than force and the face of his daughter might furnish the persuasion, so he consented.

When Xenia was driven to the farm Rudolf was standing at the gate. Xenia leaned out of the coach window and asked if he was Rudolf. When he said yes she was greatly pleased. He bore in face and figure evidence of his royal descent and, though he was dressed in a countryman's apparel, appeared to be a manly fellow, with a countenance denoting nobility of character.

"I have come from the king," said Xenia. "I am the crown princess. I wish you to be a page in my suit. You won't refuse me, will you?"

The boy, more wonder stricken than before, stood for a few moments speechless; then he said:

"If I go to the palace who will attend to my mother's cabbages? They will not thrive, and she will be without support."

An attendant whispered something in the princess' ear, and she said to the boy, "Your mother will receive a pension from my father, the king, that will enable her to live like a lady."

Rudolf seemed lost in thought. Then, fixing his eyes on the princess admiringly, he threw down a spade he held in his hand and said:

"I will go with you, but I must tell my mother."

The princess waited, and in due time the boy appeared at the door in his best suit, kissing his mother goodby. Then he came out to the coach and, to the surprise and consternation of the lackeys, opened the door, entered and sat down beside the princess. They were still more amazed at her suffering him to do so without a word. Then the two were driven to the palace.

When the coach drew up in the courtyard the king was looking out to catch a glimpse of his future son-in-law and successor. Rudolf alighted and handed out the princess.

"Surely," said the king, "the boy has descended from a line of sovereigns. There is something in his bearing, in the grace of his motions, that indicates his lineage."

The young couple entered the palace, and Xenia, smiling, led the youth to his father, saying:

"I asked him to come with me, papa, and he came because I asked him."

Rudolf put out his hand to the king as if he were his majesty's equal. Caspar was about to draw back with kingly dignity when it occurred to him that since the young man was the legitimate sovereign, while he himself was a subject, the plan he had in view would be better served by humoring him, and he took the proffered hand.

"I dare say, your majesty," said Rudolf, "that you are a good king since your daughter is such a lovely princess."

The king called his chamberlain and directed him to take the young man to the apartments that had been prepared for him and to see that he was attired in court costume. When Rudolf stepped forth in velvet and lace, with a rapier by his side, his manly beauty struck every one who saw him. All wondered that he seemed so much at home. Instead of going about gaping at everything he saw he seemed surprised at nothing. A courtier asked him how he felt, coming from a farm to a palace.

"How do I feel? I feel—somehow I feel—as if I were the king."

A chill ran through those who heard the reply, and he who had asked the question whispered to a companion:

"Let his majesty beware. If I mistake not this clodhopper has in him the elements of which kings are made and some day with that princely stride of his will walk to the throne and sit upon it."

Whether it was because the young man's bearing suited King Caspar's purpose or that an inheritance of kingly attributes coursed through Rudolf's veins, certain it is that the young man became a dominant factor at court.

It is not to be supposed that any man could step from cabbage raising to attendance upon royalty without in the beginning committing many blunders. But Rudolf soon acquired the reputation of one who despised conventionality, and when he erred through want of training he was able to give the appearance of one who knew better, but would not take the trouble to do better. The king gave him his choice of preferments, expecting that he would choose the profession most in favor with young men of the time—arms. But Rudolf asked to be educated for a diplomat, whereupon the king sent him as an attendant on an embassy to a neighboring government to conclude a treaty. When the embassy returned Rudolf had concluded the treaty, while the ambassador, who had been outwitted, returned in disgrace.

The rise of the clodhopper was rapid, the king having to bestow upon him one rank after another to keep pace with his personal acquirements. From the lowest grade of noble he filled every grade to that of duke. The king, not being yet ready to acknowledge his royal blood, could not make him a prince, but it was rumored that some further elevation was in store for him.

One day King Caspar fell ill. It was understood that his malady was serious, and the council had misgivings as to the succession. The Princess Xenia was but eighteen years old, and it was rumored that Duke Rudolf would on the king's death seize the government. The real danger was concealed. A neighboring sovereign, Otho, intrigued with certain disloyal Apulians upon the death of the king to annex their country to his kingdom.

The king's illness grew upon him so rapidly that he had no time to arrange for the succession. He died suddenly and King Otho's adherents attempted to seize the government. Duke Rudolf had been apprised of the intention and, putting himself at the head of the Apulian troops, nipped the insurrection in the bud. It was supposed by many that, having an army to support him, he would seize a government headed by a weak girl and make himself king. When quiet was restored and the conqueror rode to the palace, the princess' attendants, hearing that he was coming and fearing that he would make himself king, advised her to escape while there was yet time. Instead she went out to the main entrance and stood on the stone balcony. Rudolf rode up, dismounted and ran up the steps, greeting Xenia as queen.

"Long live the queen!"

Xenia threw her arms around him, then, turning to the people, cried:

"Long live the king!"

The secret that had been so long kept was promulgated, and the people went wild with delight, hailing Rudolf as king and Xenia as queen in the same breath.

The marriage and coronation took place on the same day, the bride and groom having been proclaimed as King Rudolf and Queen Xenia.

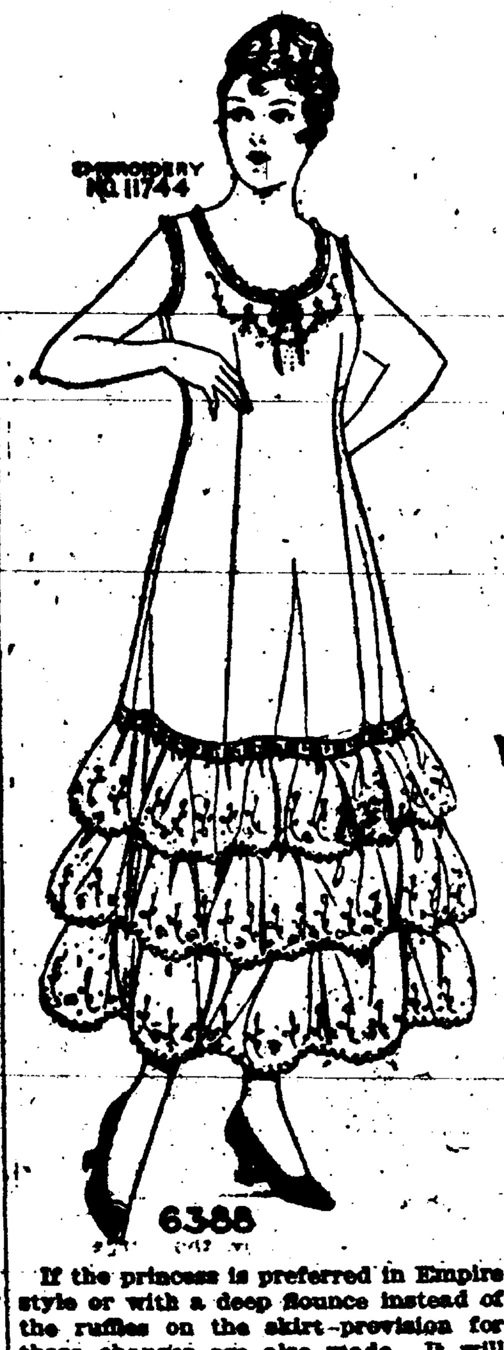
THE RETURN OF THE RUFFLED PRINCESS.



If the princess is preferred in Empire style or with a deep flounce instead of the ruffles on the skirt provision for these changes are also made. It will be found exceedingly useful this season.

With the return of the full skirts there is an accompanying revolution in underwear. The frills and folds so ruthlessly suppressed during the seasons of Directoir modes are reasserting themselves.

The five-gored princess shown here is made of fine Irish lawn, trimmed with embroidery and three frills of Valenciennes, the frills being stitched on to the skirt under a heading of insertion, through which satin ribbon is run.

If preferred the princess may be cut very low, in square effect and finished with straps to extend over the shoulders. In average size it requires 5 yards 36-inch material, with 3 yards of bearing and 9 yards 7½-inch flouncing for the frills.

Only a few hours' work are needed to put the princess together. First close the dart seam of the front and side front as notched, terminating the seam at large "O" perforation. Close under-arm and shoulder seams as notched. Close back seam from large "O" perforation to lower edge, finish edges above for opening. Turn hem at back edge of body at notches. Gather lower edge between double "TT" perforations. Sew band to lower edge, center-fronts and center-backs even (double "oo" perforations indicate center-back), and bring the large "O" perforations together. Sew shoulder strap to upper edge between small "o" perforations. Small "o" perforation in strap indicates front edge. Sew to upper edge of front, side-front.

Now, close center-back seams of ruffles and gather the upper edges. Adjust to position on slip, center-fronts even, and seams at center-back. Stitch gathers to position along the indicating crosslines of small "o" perforations (stitch flounce along the upper crossline of perforations); and if shorter length slip is made, raise the flounce or the ruffles two or four inches higher, according to the amount cut off lower edge of slip.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

THE DECORATIVE BEET.

A FINE large boiled beet may be so sliced down from the top as to closely resemble a many petaled peony, and this, quite by itself on a lettuce leaf, may be so placed as to stand in shape as a handsome salad. The parts must be held together while the cutting is done or the whole may fall like a block house and be hard to put together again.

This way of making a peony salad was discovered some years since when an attempt was made to imitate the Japanese method of carving vegetables, but, let it be said, only such as could be eaten. Uneatable garnishes are to most people of good taste generally objectionable, with the exception of lobster legs and a few like things.

The new beets are often of a rather light and beautiful peony shade when boiled, even when every rootlet and a good portion of the leaf stem is left on to keep them from bleeding. Young cooks have been known to prepare beets for boiling by paring them.

Peony Salad Recipe.

Put well washed and rinsed young beets to boil in lightly salted water to cover, and in a covered kettle. When they are tender, or in about an hour (it is a good plan to give the largest fifteen minutes' start when those of a bunch are of quite uneven size), drop them into cold water and rub off the skins quickly so that they will not cool much. Chop rather coarsely and butter them lightly while they are yet hot enough to melt the butter. Press into small cups, and when cool turn out on lettuce leaves. The mold of beets ought to keep its shape perfectly and not crumble. Encircle this at the base with slices of rather large pink and white boiled radishes. Serve with French dressing. On a noonday table these show up handsomely, just as tomatoes on green are handsomest under artificial light, and so are best for dinner.

A Jelly Recipe.

Aspic Jelly.—Take two pints of cold water, one-quarter of an ounce of vegetable gelatine, one lemon, some pepper and salt, a pinch of cayenne and two tablespoonfuls of Tarragon vinegar. Soak the gelatine two hours in one pint of water, then add the other ingredients, strain the juice of the lemon. Put over a slow fire until the gelatine is dissolved, then boil two or three minutes, and strain through jelly bag.

WINDING THE CLOCK.

Follow This System and You May Get More Accurate Time.

You cannot secure the best services from a good watch or clock unless you know how to wind them so as to cause the least wear and irregularity in their delicate machinery.

A watch should be wound at the same time every day. If allowed to run down or even almost do so and then wound up until it will not wind any further it cannot do as perfect work as a watch that is not allowed to run to its full capacity or wound up until it is as tight as it can be made.

If a watch is wound both morning and evening at about the same hour and the key is given only enough turns to wind it a little less than half what it could be wound the watch will run more evenly, wear much longer and keep more accurate time than if it is wound up tight once a day.

A watch spring will last longer if it is wound when there is the least extreme of temperature, and morning and evening are, of course, the best in that respect.

It is more or less dangerous to wind a watch during a heavy electric storm, and it is best to avoid winding while on an electric car.

An eight day clock should be wound twice a week at as regular periods as possible to secure the best results. Never allow the clock to run down, and if possible do not wind it until it is tight.

Learn by experience just how many turns of the key it takes to wind the clock to run eight days and then when half of the week is gone wind the clock by giving the key just half as many turns as it would require to wind it all the way. More accurate time will be had and it will avoid placing any of the parts in a strain, which is frequently the cause of good clocks giving out in some particular before they have served half as long as they should.

A little attention to this advice will lengthen the life of any watch or clock and make it a better timepiece.—New York American.

Cream, Butter and Yellow.

Scientific experiments have demonstrated that, contrary to the general belief, the yellow color of cream and butter is not necessarily an indication of their richness. It was discovered long ago that most vegetable matter contains a yellow substance called "carrotin" because it exists abundantly in carrots. It is this substance contained in the cow's feed that gives rise to the color of milk and butter. Carrotin is most abundant in the green forage available in spring and summer, so that milk and butter produced then are more yellow than in the winter, although the percentage of fat in winter milk often is higher than in the rich looking product obtained in summer.

Getting His Hair Cut.

"HAD MY HAIR CUT TOO."

Mr. Cleverleigh entered his club a few mornings ago, his chin and cheeks showing plainly that he was freshly emancipated from the hands of the barber.

"Been having a shave, old man?" asked Dubbins lazily.

"Yes, and had my hair cut, too," was the reply. "Always have my hair cut when I have a shave."

"And how often do you get shaved?" was the languid inquiry from his friend.

"Every morning," answered Cleverleigh.

"And have your hair cut, too, every day?" said the other.

"Yes."

"Don't you find it rather expensive?"

"No; it only costs 15 cents."

"What! Only 15 cents for a shave and hair cutting?"

"That's all. Barber couldn't shave me without cutting my hair, you know."

And it took poor Dubbins seven and a half minutes by the club clock to see why.

Tears.

If every wish were granted,
If every hope came true,
If every seed we planted
A lovely blossom grew,
If every day were sunny
And every one were wise,
There'd be no sweet in honey,
There'd be no joys to prize.

If we knew that tomorrow
Would be just like today,
With not one touch of sorrow,
No care to spoil our play,
No doubt and no misgiving,
No heartaches and no fears,
Then vain were all our living,
We'd crave the joy of tears.

We'd sigh for sacred sorrow,
We'd long to feel the rain,
And we should yearn to borrow
The blessedness of pain,
For more than all the pleasure
That came and quickly fled
Adown the years we treasure
The tears that we have shed.

Wise Joseph.

Monsieur wanted the picture hung to the right; madame wanted it on the left. But monsieur insisted that the servant should hang the picture according to his orders. Consequently Joseph stuck a nail in the wall on the right, but this done he also went and stuck another in on the left. "What is that second nail for?" his master inquired in astonishment. "It's to save me the trouble of fetching the ladder tomorrow when monsieur will have come round to the views of madame."—Argonaut.

One of Dr. Hale's Jokes.

When he was quite a young man the late Dr. Edward Everett Hale played a practical joke on some girls who were members of a party with whom he was summering on the Massachusetts coast.

All these girls were reading the same exciting novel, and one day at dinner it was a leading topic. Knowing that none of them had finished it, Hale, unknown to them, carried it away with him the next morning when he went to the city. On the train he wrote an absurd conclusion to the novel, laying the final scene at the summer resort.

Carrying this bogus conclusion to a publisher, a friend of his, he had it put in type, and then, carefully removing the bona fide conclusion, he pasted in his own. On his return he placed the book on the piazza and waited. The look which spread over a girl's face as she read that last chapter was, Dr. Hale declared, worth going far to see.

A Job of Branding.

The government official had been telling a simple old Scotch farmer what he must do in the case of a German invasion on the east coast of Scotland. "An' hae I really tae dae this wi' a' ma beesties if the Germans come?" asked the old fellow at the finish. The official informed him that such was the law. "All live stock of every description must be branded and driven inland." "Weel, I'm thinking I'll hae an awfu' job wi' ma bees!"

A Great Relief.

An old organ blower lay on his deathbed. He was a good old fellow, and everybody liked him. He had always been ready to do anything and everything connected with the church without complaining, but had evidently had his own troubles which he had kept locked in his breast.

The curate was with the old man, soothing and comforting him as best he could.

"Would you mind, sir," said the sick man, "asking the organist to play the dead march over me? I just love that dead march!"

"Certainly, with pleasure, Mr. Jones," replied the curate.

"Thank'ee, sir; none o' that there tweedledum Beethoven, you know, but Handel's."

"I can promise that much, my good man," said the curate.

The old man lay placidly for awhile and then exclaimed with fervor, "How thankful I am that I shan't have to blow for him when he plays the lead part at the end!"

ENTERTAINMENT KINK.

How to Give a Cafeteria Party, Making the Guests Do the Waiting.

After all the guests had assembled in the library they were invited to come into the dining room through a small door, which obliged them to enter one by one. At their right they passed a table heaped high with black enameled waiters, to which each helped himself or herself in passing.

Still standing in line, they conned the burlesque bills of fare posted around the room and, having made up their minds to a choice of the various goodies, helped themselves from the array of dishes spread on a narrow table extending the length of the room and presided over by a trio of young people attired in the extreme of waiters' uniforms. Having filled their trays to their satisfaction, they gathered the necessary table silver, and as they passed slowly from the low French windows out on to the glass inclosed, heated and lighted veranda each was handed his gay paper napkin, one to go under the tray and an individual one numbered to indicate table. These napkins had, of course, been numbered in duplicate, and one did not know until he had found his table who his partner was going to be. Each little table was decorated with a gay posey and flanked with a pitcher of ice water and two tumblers. The veranda was decorated with garlands of electric bulbs dropped into Japanese lanterns.

After much merrymaking all the lively crowd was seated, only leaving their tables to return to the table for second helps for themselves or partners of the delicious chicken salad, shrimp pates or rasp rolls.

When the first course was entirely finished the proprietor (hostess) asked each youth to return napkins and trays of used dishes to the dumb waiter, while she again distributed the napkins in twos. When the youths returned the numbers on their fresh napkins told them that they must seek partners with numbers corresponding and get for them the cream and cake which by this time was dished and waiting on the long table.

Still another change of partners was effected when the coffee and mints were distributed, and the affair passed off pleasantly, terminating in a jolly veranda dance.

The Jaw of an Otter.

You can find an example of nature's adaptation of the jaw to use in the case of certain carnivora, like the otter—a big weasel that has acquired aquatic habits. The jaws of such beasts are so fixed in the sockets that dislocation is impossible. In some instances you cannot, even after the animal is dead, separate the jaw from the head. This arrangement is evidently designed to enable the beast to bite to the greatest advantage without danger that the chewing apparatus will come loose.

COMMISSION GOVERNMENT NOT THE REMEDY FOR OUR MUNICIPAL ILLS

TO THE VOTERS OF THIS CITY:

There has been recently much criticism of alleged looseness, inefficiency, if not downright dishonesty, in city affairs. The criticisms are mostly of a general nature because it is much easier to criticise than to correct. We are told that the present form of municipal government should be changed; that our present charter is cumbersome; that we are unable to put our finger on the man or men responsible when things go wrong; that our taxes and tax rate are too high; in fact, everything seems to be out of gear; that we are on our way to a sort of municipal hades; that our only salvation is Commission-Manager Government, with, of course, the manager from or selected by the American City Bureau through its allies in this city; of course there is nothing in the world that is wholly good or wholly bad, so we cannot expect our charter to be perfect, but taken altogether it is a very good one. Some of its provisions might be improved by amendment, notably that the Chamberlain should be under the civil service and only an expert bookkeeper allowed to hold the office. If he has the ability to discharge the duties of that office his bonding company will see that the city gets all the money that belongs to it that comes into his hands.

When the present charter was adopted the Mayor was given power to appoint all officers except the aldermen and judge, so that he would have men who would be in harmony with him, and so that the people would be able to put their finger on the man responsible. Now we are told that all this must be changed; that what we need now are commissioners to be elected at large, so that they can all be selected from one city block, or around the park, instead of from the different wards of the city as at present; and in addition, we must have a high priced manager, with almost unlimited power, and the people who are to foot the bill, are to have absolutely nothing to say about his selection, for he is to be appointed by the commissioners, and the whole profit is to have a long term of office.

The visionaries of the Chamber of Commerce and other advocates of take for granted that municipal government under that name is a sort of guaranty for honesty, efficiency and economy in municipal affairs; that it will usher in a sort of municipal millenium, for some inscrutable reason, beyond the ken of ordinary mortals. They seem to think that there is in commission government some mysterious and miraculous power that will attract to office supermen, who will be practically infallible, above suspicion and not subject to any of the temptations that assail officials under the present form. While in the cities now operating under commission government, with or without a manager, there is absolutely nothing to justify their faith, the advocates of the new style of government profess to believe that under it taxes will be lower, that the expenses of the city will be lower. If they have gone into the matter they know that the opposite will be the result. I defy any advocate of commission-manager government, to show how they can, without impairing the efficiency, substantially reduce the expense of the department of education, or the fire department, or the police department. It is said that a city manager "speeds up" the city employe so that the city gets more for its money. Possible he might have the police run up and down their beats instead of walking, and he might have the firemen out cleaning the streets between fires, and thus eliminate the horse ball detective and his patrol wagon. There are several "savings" that a good manager might make. The salaries of the Clerk and Chamberlain are not too high, the city bonds and interest must be paid; necessary repairs and unforeseen expenditures incident to city management must be taken care of, and all the money necessary to run the city must be raised by taxation.

That there is and always has been and always will be some waste, no one will deny, but anyone familiar with city affairs knows that it will never equal in any year what it will cost in salaries for commissioners and a manager, for the adoption of commission-manager government will mean an additional salary list of from six to ten thousand dollars a year to the expenses we already have, which addition must be raised by taxation, thereby increasing taxes already high enough. Taxpayers might as well bring themselves to a realization of the fact that the day of low taxes in this city or any other city has gone by, and gone by forever. Our high tax rate can be substantially lowered only by increasing assessments which in the great majority of cases are below real value.

The Chamber of Commerce in its published statement classes all those who oppose commission government as "politicians and those whose assessments are lower in proportion than anyone else," the writer is only one of many opposed to the Chamber's scheme who are not politicians and than their neighbors, and in black faced type the Chamber hurls this question, "Do the politicians (which includes all those opposed to commission government) want publicity?" and it answers no. And we might ask, does the Chamber of Commerce want publicity? and the fact that there appeared in a recent issue of a local paper, a statement, the substance of which was, that the proceedings of the Chamber of Commerce were to be censored before being published, would indicate that the Chamber of Commerce is "some politician" and not above using the methods of the so-called politicians which it so loudly condemns. With the exception of closing the stores on Monday evenings and the burning of a pile of rubbish, without the benefit of clergy (and it will always remain a mystery whether the latter was by accident or design, on account of a world old jealousy between the D. D.'s and the M. D.'s) the reorganized Chamber of Commerce, with access to the accumulated wisdom and experience of the American City Bureau, with an expert and high salaried secretary; with ample funds; with a directorate composed of the highest of the local highbrows, the fact remains that after months of organized existence the reorganized Chamber of Commerce, hasn't accomplished any more than the disorganized Chamber of Commerce which it succeeded, and in the opinion of the writer there are many jobs nearer its size that it might profitably engage in, before it undertakes to destroy the present government and replace it with what will prove an unsatisfactory and highly expensive experiment for the taxpayers of this city.

The so-called taxpayers' committee, composed of members of the Chamber of Commerce, is buying advertising space in which it unwittingly blackens the good name of the city. While posing as reformers they scatter broadcast the impression that our city affairs are now and have been in the hands of crooks and incompetents, the statement has been made, in substance, that large gobs of the taxpayers' money have gone to the "politicians" and "they won't tell" anyone who has seen the common council struggling with the budget, paring this fund and that to fit within the legal limit, knows that the statement was little short of idiots. As a sample of their business judgment and economy they will spend a thousand dollars or more on an unnecessary special election. Anyone watching the trend of affairs and the antics and activities of those reputed to be members of the taxpayers' committee cannot help believing that their clamor for commission government is largely due to a desire of those on the outside, to get on the inside, for they think they see in the proposed upheaval a chance for them to land in office. Indeed, if they could get their front feet in the public trough the present government which they decried, would be plenty good enough; their zeal as reformers would fade like an uneasy dream, and their interest in commission government would go glimmering through the dream of things that were. There are those who honestly believe that commission government will really better conditions, but they are mistaken. They seem to overlook the fact that the same combination of voters can elect as commissioners the same dreadful "politicians" who now rule us that they can put back in office the same incompetents' We now have, if there be any such, and then the result will be that the taxpayers will be paying liberal salaries for services we now get for nothing. Conditions can be improved, but commission plan is not what we need. So-called good government, shorn of verbiage and sentiment, means simply honesty, common sense and reasonable efficiency applied to city affairs. It's the men more than the method that counts, for you can take the most successful and perfectly systematized business and put it in the hands of incompetent or dishonest men, and that business will last just as long as its capital and credit—and no longer.

They clamor about the city's bonded debt. How could it have been otherwise; how could the city have made the public improvements, put in miles of paved streets and sidewalks, built schoolhouses, bridges and sewer systems, and other improvements, except by issuing bonds and spreading the payment over a term of years? Giving long term bonds for short lived improvements may not be "good business," but if those improvements were paid for the year in which they were made it would have meant practically the confiscation of property to pay the taxes. Why do not these rainbow chasers tell us how they will make improvements and lower taxes at the same time. We know they can juggle the tax rate, but that won't lower the tax. They do not tell us because they cannot. They are running around in circles raising a great dust for the purpose of blinding some people. Their insincere clamor about the tax rate is simply for the purpose of deceiving the voters in an attempt to put over the smoothest bunk game ever tried in this city, and if those who clamor loudest for the change get commission government and fail to get the offices they are after, within a year they will be cursing the new government as heartily as they are the present. They are spending hundreds of dollars in paid advertisements boosting the commission government and knocking their own and the town. The Chamber of Commerce denies that it is paying the advertising. We know that the members of the so-called taxpayers' committee are not spending it out of their own pockets. A reputable citizen and prominent member of the Chamber of Commerce told the writer that this money is being furnished by the American City Bureau? Why?

Any man who isn't a long eared John Horse knows the reason and can see through this game himself, and recognize the Ethopian in the municipal woodpile.

Do not be fooled by the clamor about "running this city like a business" as a panacea for our municipal ills. Remember that many of these business concerns with "managers" are passing their dividends right along and the mercantile obituaries published each month by the mercantile agencies, are brief and pathetic.

Our taxes can be lowered substantially only by slowing up on expensive improvements until we catch up.

A few days back, Geneva voted down this commission plan by the decisive vote of about six hundred to sixty, and the voters of the city should beat it by a greater adverse majority. It should be buried so deep that there won't be a bubble come up to show where the thing went to.

If you want to prevent your tax getting any higher than it is, VOTE NO on this proposition.

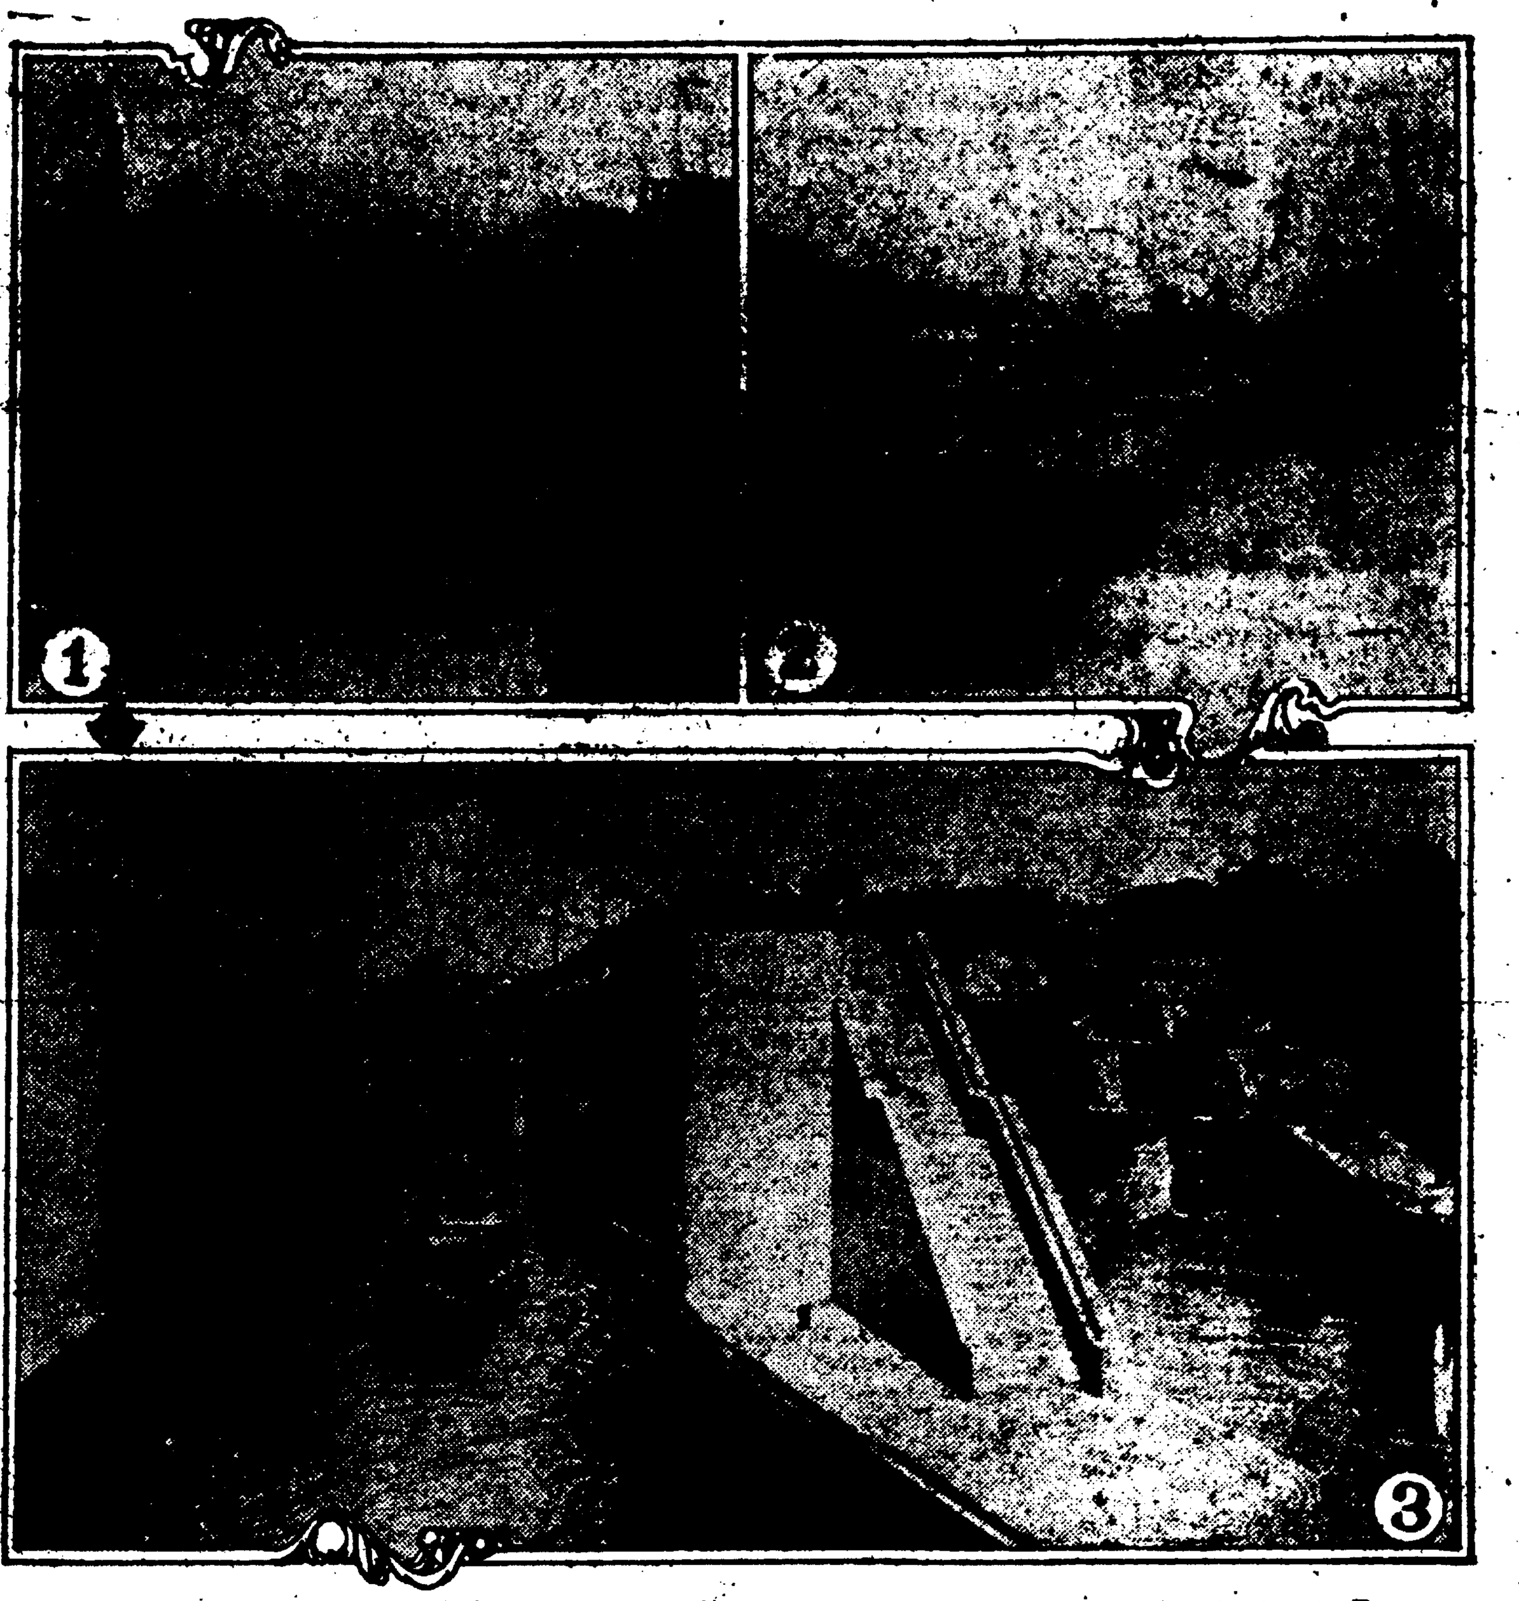
Three Views of New York's Great Barge Canal



No. 1.—Where the barge canal descends what geologists call the "Niagara Escapement" at Lockport. Two new locks replace old tier of five locks.

No. 2.—Dock wall and graded areas for terminal of barge canal at one of the villages on the Mohawk. State is building these terminals at about fifty cities and villages throughout the state. One of most important features of canal system. Furnishes place where any shipper or boatman may have free dockage uncontrolled by railroads and use, at a moderate cost, of best loading machinery.

No. 3.—Lock 2 of the barge canal, Waterford, beside flight of three old locks. Occasion of official opening of this section, May 15, 1915. First boat carries governor and state officials; second is press boat.

CANAL A GREAT ARTIFICIAL RIVER

Few People Realize Extent and Value of Canal System.

TERMINALS ARE INVALUABLE

Annual Savings In Freight Tonnage of Barge Canal When Completed Will Not Be Less Than $10,000,000.

Few people realize the extent and value of the canal system of New York state. It is thought of simply as a canal by most people who think of it at all, and only those who are familiar with it know anything about the worth and incidental values which it has. For instance, the state sells a large amount of water from the canal, and many power plants are operated all along the line which could not be operated were it not for the barge canal. The state is, of course, a very large owner of lands, and hundreds of private enterprises are occupying state lands within the blue line. Both at Buffalo and at New York and to some extent along the line of the canals the state owns valuable harbor and terminal rights.

The extent of the barge canal system is also practically unknown. It really reaches from the north end of Lake Champlain to New York city in the east and from Buffalo to New York city on the main line connecting with Lake Ontario and Oswego and with Cayuga and Seneca lakes, thus reaching as far south as Ithaca in the center of the state and including altogether 700 miles of canals. This in reality is a great artificial river across the state of New York, with its branches north and south supplying water powers and transportation facilities to by far the largest part of the population of the state. In the hands of a private corporation this immense property would be capitalized at not less than $1,000,000,000.

Saves Dollar a Ton.

Since the saving on freight will average at least a dollar a ton on the canal as compared with present railroad rates it is estimated that not less than 10,000,000 tons per year will be carried on the new canal, and in all probability the tonnage will reach 20,000,000 within a few years. It is easy to see that with the proper rental for the water and for the lands occupied by private interests, with proper charge for the use of terminals and docks and with the profits of carrying freight, the canal system could actually be made to pay interest on $1,000,000,000. It does not do, therefore, to underestimate the value of this great property which the state has inherited from past generations.

It is almost impossible to overestimate its value, and the fact that the whole canal system is tied up at present and is bringing in no money to the people of the state on account of the shortage of funds must necessarily appeal to every citizen who is a part owner in this great property. It is a fact that not over $10,000,000 is needed to complete the canal physically. The bond issue of $27,000,000 which is to be voted upon this fall includes $13,500,000 for land damages to which the state is already committed and which the state must pay in any event.

$10,000,000 For Construction.

It also includes $3,654,000 which the state is spending this year out of the treasury and which will be put back into the treasury if the bond issue carries. There are included in this sum the estimated engineering expenses, so the further amount actually needed for the completion of the canal—that is, for construction work—is less than $10,000,000. The referendum carries all these amounts as a lump sum of $27,000,000. The people of the state have not yet realized the enormous value of the canal system; neither do they yet realize the great amount of work which has already been done in building the barge canal.

The engineer's office says that it is 90 per cent completed. That 90 per cent means little unless it is completed. All the way between the Hudson river and Lake Champlain, between the Oneida lake and Lake Ontario and between Troy and Buffalo there are concrete structures which are as fine as anything in the world. The amount of excavation which has been made for this new canal is almost equal to the excavation for the Panama canal.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BOWS BEFORE OPINION OF STATE'S ATTORNEY ASKING THE ALDERMEN TO RESCIND ACTION

Postponement and No Date Set for Reappearance of Plan to Carry City Into Class With Nearly Four Hundred Progressive American Cities.

There will be no special election tomorrow to determine whether or not the City of Fulton shall adopt the simplified form of government, known as Plan C, which calls for administration of city affairs by a commission, with a city manager. By the unanimous vote of the Common Council called into special session last night, the motion of the meeting of August 3, calling the election, was rescinded, and the question will not be decided tomorrow.

The action of the Common Council came as a climax to several days of uncertainty and doubt on the part of both the pro-commission and anti-commission forces. About two weeks ago the Chamber of Commerce, it is understood, received a quiet tip from Watertown, after the commission government forces there had struck a snag, to carefully look up every detail connected with the election and particularly the possibility of electing commissioners this year, if the plan should be adopted. After a short search legal advisors of the Chamber of Commerce discovered a fact that had been overlooked when the date for the election was set, namely, that even if the plans were adopted here, officers could not be elected under the commission form until 1917, because the time for the filing of nominations with the Board of Election Commissioners had passed.

The Chamber [illegible] to get the opinion of Attorney General Woodbury, however, and although the difficulty was already widely known, no mention of the fact was made in any local newspaper, although on Friday last The Times carried an opinion of a citizen relative to the practicability of electing the commissioners this year, in which he stated that he did not believe it possible, because all nominations had already been filed for offices under the present form and no more party nominations could be filed.

A reporter for The Evening Times asked for opinions on the question from several local attorneys and Hubert L. Gilman, who had investigated the subject thoroughly, said Monday:

"In my opinion, should the commission form carry next Friday, no officers could be elected under that form until the next general city election, following the one in November. There is nothing in the optional city government plan which automatically dispenses with the present form of government, nor with the nominations already filed under that plan. The day for filing nominations to be voted upon at the general city election has passed. After September 7 no more nominations can be filed with the election commissioners.

"Therefore, how is it possible to elect a man under the commission plan if one cannot be nominated? You cannot have independent nominations, for thereby you disfranchise the Republican, Democratic and Prohibition parties, as they cannot make a selection. Nominations have already been made for the offices of Mayor, Alderman and the other city offices and these must be voted upon.

"Now, if the special election for Commission Government had taken place September 7 the nominations for commissioners could have been filed. As it stands at present, it is simply wasting $1,100 to vote on the commission form at a special election, if it cannot be put into effect for two years, when the question might have been submitted at the general election with no additional expense."

Mr. Gilman stated that several other local attorneys concur with him in his opinion and he gave the name of one of them, who informed a Times reporter that insofar as he had learned, Mr. Gilman's opinion was correct, but that he did not wish to be quoted. City Attorney George M. Fanning was unwilling to make public his opinion, but said he was preparing a statement on the question which would be issued later.

The election law governing the adoption of the commission form reads that the men "shall be elected at the next succeeding general city election" if the plan meets with public approval. The opinions expressed seem to agree that an election could not be held without nominations, and the time for nominations has passed.

Meanwhile, the Chamber of Commerce communicated with the Attorney General, but owing to his absence from Albany, his opinion was delayed and did not reach this city until Tuesday. It was as follows:

Opinion of the Attorney General

I know of no other method of relief which will harmonize with the provision in Section 23 of Chapter 444 of the laws of 1914, requiring the election of city officers to be held at the general city election next succeeding the adoption of the plan than this:

In case the officer with whom the certificates of nomination are required to be filed should refuse to receive them, for that purpose a summary proceeding might be instituted under Section 56 of the election law to compel their acceptance, in which proceeding it could be shown wherein the delay occurred, and that said delay was not the fault of the nominees but of the petitioners for or the officials [illegible] for the adoption of the plan.

You might consult such authorities as Matter of Darling, 189 N. Y. 570, etc.

Yours very truly,

E. E. WOODBURY,
Attorney General.

By C. T. DAWES, Deputy Attorney General.

The Resolution

To the Honorable Mayor and Common Council of the City of Fulton:

We submit herewith a resolution unanimously adopted by the Board of Directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Fulton, this 15th day of September, 1915, and urge your Honors to take such action as is suggested therein.

Whereas, The Chamber of Commerce is advised through the Attorney General of the State of New York, that by virtue of the conflict of certain provisions of the general law of the State known as Chapter 444 of the Laws of 1914, being an act to authorize a city of the second or third class to adopt a Commission Form of Government, with cetrain provisions of the General Election Law, such as to involve such commissioners as would be elected under the plan at the coming November election, in the event of its approval at the proposed Special Election of Friday, September 17th, in such a way as to cause serious doubt as to the legality of their actions as the governing body of the city, thereby involving the city in a possible series of legal entanglements; and

Whereas, It appears that through these conflicting statutes, should such commissioners not be nominated and elected subsequent to a favorable vote on the proposition at Friday's Special Election, that city officers elected under the present City Charter would be compelled to take office with a shadow of doubt as to the legality of their election, and that there would for this reason be introduced a doubt as to the legality of their actions; and

Whereas, It is apparent that there are important financial transactions to be performed by the governing body of the city within the next few months, chiefly by reason of the maturity of certain bond issues, and it being of the utmost importance that these legal complications be, if possible, avoided; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it being the purpose of the Chamber of Commerce to further all that will result for the common good, the Chamber of Commerce requests that Common Council of the City of Fulton, because of the reasons herein set forth to discontinue the Special Election called for September 17th, 1915.

Unanimously adopted by the Board of Directors of the Chamber of Commerce, September 15th, 1915, there being present Messrs. Whitaker, Morrill, Emerick, Paddock, Sullivan, Butts, Morin, Achilli and O'Brien, the entire board, and Mr. Lipsky, Treasurer.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

By WAYNE D. HEYDECKER, Secretary.

As stated in the petition presented to the Common Council, the officials of the Chamber of Commerce decided to request that the election be abandoned. Accordingly the petition was drawn and filed with City Clerk Scudder at 3:15 yesterday afternoon. The Common Council meeting was called last night.

President Whitaker Absolves From Blame for the Mistake the Chamber of Commerce and All City Officials, Remaining Silent as to Who is Responsible.

The session was attended by a large crowd of interested citizens and after Mayor Fox read the petition an open discussion followed. Several of the aldermen were loud in their denunciation of the mismanagement which cost the city $300 for a special registration on Wednesday and attempts were made at once to fix the blame for the faux pas.

The supporters of the movement claim that George M. Fanning, City Attorney, knew the commissioners could not be elected when the date for the election was set, while the opposition followers say the Chamber of Commerce is to blame, for the reason that it agitated the election without first ascertaining whether the adoption of the commission form would mean an immediate change in government, as promised in the political advertising of the supporters of the plan. The aldermen were inclined to think the Chamber of Commerce was directly responsible and some of the councilmen were of the opinion that the Chamber of Commerce should defray the expense of the special registration and the printing of ballots.

N. L. Whitaker, President of the Chamber, addressed the council and told of the discovery of the difficulty, laying stress on the fact that neither the Chamber nor the council was at fault, but the advisors of both bodies.

The statements that the impracticability of electing commissioners under the new form was known to the City Attorney when the Common Council set the date of election after the last day for the filing of petitions, is not generally credited, and the general opinion seems to be that the point involved was a chance discovery, which came soon after the Business Men's League abandoned its advertising campaign.

The discovery and its result are regarded by the supporters of the plan as particularly untimely in view of the fact that the commission form had won many converts within the past two weeks, and had an even chance, if not better, of winning at the polls.

AMERICAN BORN NUMBER 9814; ALIENS 1321; AN OFFICIAL GAIN OF 655

Albany, Sept. 16.—Fulton's population has increased to the extent of 655 during the past five years, the 1915 census figures becoming available today through an announcement made at the office of Secretary of State Hugo. Fulton now has a population of 11,135, including 1,321 aliens, leaving its citizens numbering 9,814. In 1910 Fulton had 10,480 residents.

The city's increase in population during the past five years differs but little from the growth which is shown between 1900 and 1905, amounting to 641. In 1900 the enumeration showed the Oswego county city as having a population of 8,206, which was increased to 8,847 by 1905.

Fulton's banner years from a population standpoint were from 1905 to 1910, when the city increased its residents by 1,633, attaining a population of 10,480 by the latter year.

For a city its size Fulton's growth during the last fifteen years, amounting to 2,929, compares favorably with cities of about the same population in the state, excluding those immediately adjoining metropolitan districts. In ten years Fulton has had a growth of 2,288.

DIRECTUM I WENT AFTER TRACK RECORD YESTERDAY; NEARLY ALL FULTON THERE

Approximately 500 Fultonians helped swell the attendance figures at the State Fair to the 30,000 mark yesterday in spite of the intense heat. The thermometer was once more in the 90's, but the crowd surpassed the expectations of the fair authorities by a large margin.

The races were the feature events of the day, and in the memory of the oldest follower of the turf there never has been a day like yesterday. Purses totaling almost $20,000 were hung up and once more "Pop" Geers, the veteran of the turf, was a star. Yesterday, however, Tommy Murphy, another veteran, by winning the Empire State $10,000 pace with Peter Scott and driving Directum I to a world's record mark of 1:56 3-4, earned a draw with Geers in the honor class.

The grand-stand was crowded with spectators when the racing began. All the events were closely contested, particularly the Chamber of Commerce stakes, which developed into a fight between Russell Boy and Hal Boy for first honors, with Russell Boy, Geers up, the winner.

With Murphy up, Directum I started after the track record of 1:59 1-4, shortly after 4 o'clock. The weather conditions were ideal and after the crack pacer had covered the half mile the timers began to sense a new record. When Murphy flashed across the line yelling "56 3-4" from his own watch, the stands gave him an ovation.

Adams, the aviator, completed a double-loop-the-loop and some spectacular on-the-side flying, and a balloon ascension was another feature of the afternoon. A squadron of New York mounted Police gave an exhibition drill opposite the grandstand, and Miss Adele Von Ohl, considered the greatest woman equestrienne in the country, performed with her trick horse on the track. Conway's band furnished a fine musical program between the events, and a soloist rendered several selections.

Voters Who Can't Read English

No man can gain a thorough understanding of America unless he can speak and understand the English language. And if he cannot read the language he is greatly handicapped as a citizen. So if, the legislature should ever place before the people a provision for the constitution that all voters must be able to read and write English, there will be plenty of reason for adopting it, and there can be but little doubt but that the people would adopt it by a large majority. Other states have submitted such amendments to a referendum, and in every case they were adopted by large majorities.

The recent Constitutional Convention moved to adopt such a provision, and then reversed itself, and voted the proposition down. It was voted down not because the members of the convention were convinced of the conposal was bad, but because they felt that it would pile up further opposition to the constitution and prevent its passage.

There is a great deal of sentiment in favor of restricting the vote to English speaking people. This isn't on the theory that people, who do not read our language are not intelligent, but because they would be very much better informed about our country if they read the language of the country. An American would make a very partial and one-sided voter in a foreign land if he couldn't read the language of the country of his adoption, and the same is true of new residents here who often find it easy to become naturalized.

We don't want to become a people of different languages, customs and habits or thought, with all the race difficulties of the Balkan States. If our language is not favored, the country as a meeting pot is that much impaired.—Utica Observer.

Some Hopeful Business Signs.

A tip as to how things businesswise are progressing is supplied by the decrease of over 80,000 during August in the country's idle freight cars.

This hopeful shrinkage—the biggest for any month of this year—means that the movement of our crops and of coal of tidewater and westward has begun seriously, enough to requisition over 3,000 box and coal cars every business day. These figures furnish but another instance of the consistent improvement noted since January. Already attention has been directed to the wholesome reduction in commercial failures, both in number and amount of indebtedness; to the steady betterment in railroad earnings and to the remarkable growth in that barometic industry, steel.

Succeeding months promise even better results. There are a billion bushels of wheat to be carried from the farm to the ultimate consumer, three billion bushels of corn and a billion and a half bushels of oats. Each week finds the three great Atlantic coal seaports reporting phenomenal loadings, destined for our new customers across the seas. Deliveries are now being made in volume on the huge orders for war munitions taken by American concerns.

On August 31 the net surplus of idle cars in the United States numbered 183,659, and a year ago, 163,326, when the most tremendous outgoing shipments of breadstuffs in the country's history were being recorded.

When it is considered that the idle car total has increased 148,325, or nearly 50 per cent., since April last, it is no delusion to anticipate an actual shortage, instead of a surplus, of idle cars before many fortnights.—New York American.

HUSTLING WHILE WAITING

The deferred election for the Commission-Manager form of government for this city, due to reasons explained on page 1 of this edition, will bring to many a sense of disappointement. However, shall one gainsay the fact that fine as the principles of the new government are, a delay in their application may be advantageous. All business of men, in order to succeed, must be planned. While the advocates of the new system are familiar with its principles, no doubt yet the real success of its activities would certainly lie in the timber of its construction.

The generals of an army are the ones who carry out the plans. No matter how excellent the map used, the generals must execute successfully—in order to win.

In order to choose five men in this city to steer our little ship through to calm untroubled waters is indeed; a task.

To choose such men, upon short notice, might have resulted disastrously. It is to be remembered the advocates of the new system have always made clear that the wrong men enthroned under the Commission-Manager form does not insure a success greater than under the old form. A greater length of time may help the people to choose with greater care their representatives.

Lest those anxious for the change be too impatient, it is to be remembered that "all things come to him who waits"—and hustles while he waits.

If Rome was not built in a day, neither is a campaign of war or business determined at once. But everyone who wants the truth and is willing to reject proved error will have ample opportunity to satisfy himself. And so, Commission-Manager form of government may find entire Fulton anticipating its opportunities when in the space of time necessary it is ready for it.

Fulton means the people, the taxpayers of Fulton, and all the people all the time will not be content to stand in their own light.

The satisfaction that comes when you pay for a cheap article, is short lived. And how "cheap" a fellow feels when he goes to use it. This "cheap" feeling discounts your self-respect.

I never touch this subject that my mind reverts to the trite, true, business proverb of Mr. Simmons—"The recollection of Quality remains long after the price is forgotten."

This maxim has been translated into various tongues, and the man who made it is without doubt one of the past grand masters, one of the exalted rulers, one of the potentates of taking stock off the shelves, and putting currency in the cash register.

Mr. E. C. Simmons, Chairman of the Simmons Hardware Company of St. Louis, is recognized by authority, as the Dean of Salesmanship. His concern pays more freight on goods sold than any house this side or the other side of the Missouri River.

Some day take a good, long look in the mirror. It will help you tolerate the faults of others.

Sleep is the great restorer, but a man cannot sleep when his conscience is seeing unlaid ghosts.—The Silent Partner.

Useless Riches.

Kipling's "The King's Ankus" well expresses the philosophy of useless riches. Mowgli with the assistance of the Kaa, the rock python, stole into the decayed valut of a long dead Indian monarch, which was guarded by an old white cobra, warden of the king's treasure. The jungle had swallowed a mighty city; its men and women were gone; the only hint that humanityonce inhabited the place the skulls of two thieves who came to steal resting sardonically on the coins and brilliants. The cobra spoke to them in the dark and they were still.

Mowgli, of course, the child of nature, was mystified and could not understand. To him this tinsel was hard, not good to eat and, therefore fancied was a gorgeous ankus, an elephant goad. This did not balance as well as his hunting knife, but he took it with him into the forest. And the cobra warned him:

"It is death, it is death, it is death," he hissed.

It was heavy, Mowgli soon tired of it, hurled it from and went to sleep. When he awoke he saw vividly the truth of the cobra's statement. Big Foot killed Little Foot for it; Big Foot was slain by three others, who, in turn, died because each lusted for the thing.

Whether Mrs. Nichols died of the fright or was strangled by the thieves who desired her treasure does not matter. She died for a few hard stones, some of which would melt in vinegar. Imagine her pleasure! Carrying the keys to her jewel chest in her corsage; bedecked with diamonds at dinner in a silent mansion; alone with servants who plotted for her gems.

They were not good to eat; they could not balance with true happiness. The pity of it is a sermon for the wise to ponder.—New York Tribune.

PEACH MARKET IS SOON TO BE FLOODED

Peaches should soon be cheaper if reports from the peach growing sections along Cayuga and Seneca Lakes and in the western part of the state are correct. Other fruit should also drop in price because the market will probably be flooded within a few days.

The hot weather of the past week has been ripening fruit rapidly, and for this reason apples have been coming in much faster than usual and if the weather does not get cooler soon apple picking will be commenced a week or two earlier than usual. In some sections along the lake it is said that winter apples are nearly ready to be handled now.

Ginseng In China.

For many years past foreign doctors in China have endeavored to convince the Chinese that there is little or no virtue in ginseng as a remedy beyond its having a slight tonic quality. But, although they have been successful in introducing foreign drugs and medicines, they have failed to reduce the use of ginseng, as the Chinese still have great faith in it.

Youth's Education Is His Foundation

By A. T. MERRILL, Wheeling, Ill.

The public schools should be brought up to the highest possible efficiency and everything should be done to allow boys and girls to receive a good education without hardship to themselves and their parents. The farmer does not try to economize in the attention and care that he gives the crop while it is growing, for he knows that he will harvest accordingly. The children of this country are the crop of the nation. The harvest will be the future generation, and any economy that is practiced on the growing crop is false economy from which the harvest will suffer.

The majority of children can attend school for only about seven or eight years of their lives. During this time they must get the foundation and a large amount of the material with which they are to go through life. How careful is the contractor who erects a skyscraper that his foundation shall be solid and true! The boy's education is his foundation whereupon to build his character and manhood. Instill in the boy, self-respect, teach him to do things whereby he will also gain confidence in himself, teach him to occupy his mind by thinking useful and uplifting thoughts of his own, and when evil influences are brought to play upon him his moral muscles will be developed and strong to resist the attacks.

Upon the school depends also our standing as a nation and the people's patriotism. The bearing that schooling has upon the progress of a country is illustrated by the fact that the United States and Germany have on an average one inhabitant out of every five in their schools, while a country like Russia has only one in every thirty-three in school.

In the schools is also about the only place in which the people in this country can be taught "America first" and that this country is not a mixture of different countries, but that it is truly American. Whether the illiterate should be excluded from this country may be debated, but the children that come here and those who are born here must be educated and taught to be good American citizens, who are proud of their country.

Children must be taught to be Americans first and should be taught the American language before any other. The American flag should be found displayed in all the schools and its significant meaning of justice, righteousness and liberty should be taught impressively.

GAME BIRDS KILLED OFF

The Weekly News Letter of the U. S. Agricultural Department says the number of game birds in the country have already diminished 90 per cent. It is the purpose of the Federal law to effect a saving of the remnant.

Continuing the Letter says:

Formerly migratory waterfowl frequented the United States in enormous numbers, and the supply appeared to be inexhaustible. During the last 75 years, however, the growth of population and the vast increase in the number of hunters, combined with greatly improved firearms and an extraordinary increase in the facilities for rapid transportation to the most remote haunts of wild life, have resulted in an appalling reduction in their numbers. It is believed to be a conservative estimate that the gross number of migratory game birds of all kinds existing today in the United States does not exceed 10 per cent. of the number which existed here 75 years ago. The decrease has been especially rapid during the last 25 years. During this period some species have become extinct, while others are nearly so.

Thoughtful sportsmen and others interested in our wild life have long realized the impossibility of saving what was left of this great national asset by state action. The rapid progress of our waterfowl toward extinction under state alws was too obvious. To save the dwindling remnant, in 1913 the Federal migratory bird law was enacted. The law has now been in effect about two years and an extended inquiry has been made by the Biological Survey as to its effect on migratory game birds. A large number of reports from State and Federal game officials and private individuals in nearly all of the States of the Union have been received. The replies from a small number of States have been doubtful, usually owing to a lack of definite information on the subject. From 40 of the states, extending from Maine to California and from the Gulf States to the Canadian border, is given unimpeachable evidence of an extraordinary increase in waterfowl during the short period the law has been in effect. The increase is commonly stated, according to the locality, to be from 10 to several hundred per cent., and includes such important species as mallards, black mallards, widgeon, springtails, blue-winged teal, green-winged teal, wood ducks, canvasbacks, Canada geese and swans.

Many of the reports are to the effect that the number of waterfowl remaining to breed exceeds anything seen during the past 10 to 25 years. The results indicate what may be expected from a long period of adequate protection.

The importance of our wild fowl as a national asset is evident when their great aggregate value is considered. The State of Maine estimates the annual income from its game resources at $13,000,000, of which about 5 per cent., or $650,000, can safely be allotted to the returns from migratory wild fowl. Oregon values the annual reurns from its game resources at $5,000,000. Of this amount about $1,000,000 may be attributed to migratory wild fowl. It is evident that the actual returns from this source in the several states reach a very large amount, and the value of this resource to the nation amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars.

The benefits of the migratory bird law in conserving and increasing the wild life of the country is not confined solely to the game birds. This law also protects at all times throughout the United States our insectivorous birds which inhabit every state. The Bureau of Entomology has estimated that insects injure agriculture and the farm products to the amount of $652,000,000 annually. When it is considered that insectivorous birds constantly prey upon and devour myriads of injurious insects throughout the country, the exceeding value of these birds in maintaining the balance of nature and in limiting the increase of our insect enemies is of untold value.

Systematic Marketing.

Effective co-operative organizations afford the best means forp rofitable marketing of the country's increasing apple crop, according to a survey of marketing conditions in the industry just published as Bulletin No. 302, "Apple Marketing Investigations 1914-15" by the United States Department of Agriculture. It states where apples are boxed instead of barreled, growers' associations mandle a large percentage of the output and in obtaining uniformity in the pack and advantageous distribution of the crop are much more successful than individual produceers in other sections. Where individuals act independently there is declared to be little uniformity in grading, and much poor fruit is shipped which, in seasons of large production such as 1914, cannot be disposed of profitably.

Observation in the Chicago market showed that 25 per cent. of the arriyals in carlot bulk, or the equivalent of 350 carloads and 10 per cent. of the barreled shipments, the equivalent of about 160 carloads, were of such poor quality that the price would not have paid the freight charges had these apples been shipped by themselves. By throwing out this poor fruit the farmers would not only have saved the cost of packing and shipping, but would have cleared the market for their good stock. Similar conditions were found elsewhere.

The effect of the war upon the industry has been found to be less disastrous than was apprehended. Because of the cheapness of the fruit, consumption was stimulated until the exports far exceeded expectations. The German ports being closed quantities of fruit was shipped direct to the Scandinavian markets for the first time. It is held that the opening of their new market should prove of considerable benefit in future years.—Auburn Advertiser.

FIVE MOONS NOW IN PLAIN SIGHT

Five moons in plain sight for the stargazers! There is first our own moon, Luna, and then there are the four moons of Jupiter appearing in the eastern skies. Jupiter can be easily recognized—it seems to be the size of a silver dollar and is only 400,000,000 miles away. Jupiter's moons are points of light, distant from here anywhere from 200,000 to 1,000,000 miles. To the observer they would look like four mills on the milled edge of the silver dollar before mentioned. The autumnal skies in this hemisphere are rich in grandeur.

UTILIZING THE VACANT LOTS

Matter of Importance in Which This Country Might Learn a Lesson Form Older Lands.

Some of the gayest, happiest pictures of family life to be found in Germany, and even as far north as Copenhagen, are of the evening gatherings of working men and women in the vacant lots, for families who live in apartments and tenements are allowed to have small gardens or play-plots there. The actuating purpose behind this movement in Europe is the preservation of the home, and limitation of the poverty and disease due to alcoholism, but it is as powerful an influence in directing the recreation of the "grownups" into wholesome channels as are our school gardens in this country.

A New York paper recently computed the value of 191,742 pieces of vacant land in the city to be $644,637,185. It is being argued that the owners should contribute the use of this land for "temporary playgrounds for children and potato patches to help hold down the cost of living for the poor."

An enterprising department store in Los Angeles recently purchased a quarter-block of land for a new site, upon which it will build five years hence. The walls of adjoining buildings were painted artistically with mountain scenery and an announcement of the advantages of this site for the future business of the store. The ground was laid out as an inviting public recreation park for children and adults, to be used until building operations commenced. Such experiments would be possible and valuable in almost every city or town.

COUNTRY TOWN MUST STAY

City Centralization a Menace to the Most Vital Interests of the Country.

The pendulum of trade is swinging slowly but certainly toward the elimination of the country town in business systems of a not far distant day, according to the views of some serious-minded students of the times. Numerous retailers of the state foresaw changes coming years ago, and are beginning to predicate their beliefs on this town elimination on the now existing conduct of business in practically every town in the state, says a Lincoln (Neb.) correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

It is a problem that has caused many a country storekeeper to swallow a lump when he began to think about it. Economists have given it theoretical attention and the merchants have considered it in the light of practice. Both are arriving at some conclusions in the matter and both are pointing out remedies which they believe could be applied in such a way that the disease, if such it be, can be checked and the identity of the country town preserved.

If not the country town—what? Therein students of economy, besides business men, become a factor in the equation. That is just it. If not the town, what shall supplant it? That is the question which farmers have begun to study, too. It's all very much of a problem to which the thoughts of hundreds of Nebraska business men are being directed at this time. It is the guiding impulse in convention discussions and the topic wherever a few of them are gathered.

Rest Rose Bushes Now.

In the case of roses now more than one year planted, no water need be given until October, unless the soil is very light indeed. This will afford a much-needed rest. Do not be troubled if some leaves turn yellow and drop away, for no harm will result. Small and soft canes may have their bark shrivel. These should be cut away about October 1, all crossing canes, tangled growths pruned out, the center of each bush left free and two-thirds of all other growth cut back. This leaves a few stubby, sturdy canes. Water well, and keep watered. When vigorous growth is started the plants will begin to respond. Then fertilize, lightly at first, and in three or four weeks as heavily as you choose. The result will be roses of a high order.

Journalistic Feat By "T. P."

A brilliantly striking feat in journalism was recently performed by T. P. O'Connor, M. P. The best appreciation of Mr. Chamberlain, from the point of view of a personal observer, which appeared in the London newspapers, was that written by Mr. O'Connor for the Telegraph. A request for the article was sent to Mr. O'Connor just as the House of Commons was rising at 5 o'clock. Between 5:30 and 7:30 p. m. he had written the appreciation, which ran to between five thousand and six thousand words. This did not exhaust Mr. O'Connor's activities for the day, as he attended the dinner of the Associated Industrial Insurance Societies in the evening, and delivered a brilliant after-dinner speech.

"Tay Pay" is renewing his journalistic youth!

THE TRADE UNION.

That the trade union movement is the highest and best developed working class movement thus far evolved no thinking man can successfully dispute.

There is no effort so potent to accomplish tangible results in the material, economic, moral or social conditions as the great economic power of the trade union movement, which recognizes the identity, the fraternity, the solidarity of labor.

THE BRITISH WORKMEN.

Manufacturers Largely to Blame For Shortage of Munitions.

A remarkable analysis of the point of view of the English workman, given by a skilled laborer in the Quarterly Review, carries the conviction that the persons primarily to be blamed for the lack of British munitions are not the workmen but the manufacturers. "The workers have absolutely no idea of endangering the empire or of exposing our troops to added risks," he writes. "Their attention is concentrated on the notion that a state of war is being made the excuse for further exploiting them. Requests made before the war are still undealt with, while the cost of living has been much increased. Protest has been unavailing, hence the strikes—unfortunately in war time." The 10,000 strikers on the Clyde demanded an additional twopence long before there was any prospect of war. The great majority of these men had had no increase in pay for seventeen years, the increase then having been one halfpenny per hour. Their employers having disdained to give an answer to their demands, in spite of the vast volume of business and the war rise in the cost of necessities, they refused to work until an answer was given. In such cases as this the fault is obviously the manufacturer's, not the workman's.

An English workman has two facts thrown in his face each day, that his wages buy less than before the war and that the work he does is producing great profits for his factory in which he has no share. England can prevent strikes for the remainder of the war either by scouring the workmen into a superangelic state of mind, in which they will not care what becomes of them and their families because of their devotion to the men in the trenches, or by prodding the factory owners into parting with a portion of the wealth that the workers are producing.

The workmen admit that the wartime strike is wrong and that they ought to be willing to refrain from striking and to sacrifice their homes, families and ordinary bare comforts for the benefit of the men in the trenches. But they ask very humbly: "To prevent strikes, why should you not sacrifice a penny of your towering profits?" and they receive the answer, "Because we are the manufacturers."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Baked Pea Soup.

Baked pea soup is recommended as very rich in flavor. Cut fine one pound of skin of beef, add half a pound of veal trimmings, a pint of split peas, two carrots, diced; two onions, sliced thin, and one ounce of rice. Season with pepper and salt, adding four quarts of water and one finely chopped stalk of celery. Put the whole in a jar, cover closely and bake for four hours.

NATIONAL NEED OF STRONG MEN

What Constitutes Preparedness For Defense.

VIGOR OF RANK AND FILE.

A Citizenship That Has Not Been Weakened by Excessive Toil and Low Working Conditions Can Stand the Test of War When Occasion Demands—Unions Should Be Fostered.

Now that men's minds are naturally directed toward national preparedness for self defense it is most fitting to consider conditions which concern national health, vigor and development. There come to all nations, whether suddenly or with warning, those tests which prove the spirit—the power of endurance of the people.

No nation can possess endurance whose citizens bear the inevitable consequences of sweatshop labor, long workdays, low wages, insanitary conditions. Physical health and vigor affect progress along all other lines. Those who toil with their hands constitute the rank and file of the citizenship of nations. If they are underfed, partly clothed, physically stunted, their condition is a menace to the nation, whether in peace or in war. When the citizens deteriorate physically the nation will decline. War may reveal unsuspected weakness, but that weakness will manifest itself under conditions of peace, though somewhat more slowly or, worse still, less observably.

That nation whose industries exploit human workers during times of peace will be burdened by a mass of unemployable, discarded workers and in times of war will find its existence threatened because of inability to produce supplies and because of dearth of fit soldiers.

Those policies and those institutions which conserve human life and which afford opportunities for the development of every citizen constitute the greatest safeguard of the nation. The citizens must be protected, but that protection must come through their own educated initiative, so that the nation shall consist of men and women conscious of their own dignity and importance, aware of their own powers and intelligently following a course of action to promote their best interests.

Individual initiative and resourcefulness are the most valuable qualities of a nation. They must not be subordinated to the outward forms of national welfare, but rather must they be the ultimate ideals of all conservation policies.

To realize these ideals the children of the nation must be assured the right to be well born, to grow and to play. Real educational opportunities must be accessible for all and must meet the needs of all.

When maturity is reached the individual citizens must have the right to a voice in determining the conditions under which they shall live and work, and they must be assured the right to organize, to express their wills in these matters. This means that society and all its agencies must put an end to all tactics that obstruct the progress and welfare of the workers instead of outlawing or ostracizing labor organizations or punishing efforts of wage earners to participate in determining conditions of work.

In wartime every nation expects loyal support for its wage earners. It expects organized co-operation in defense on the battlefield and in making munitions of war; it expects understanding of the national interests and needs. These things are equally necessary in time of peace and must be developed in times of peace. They cannot be called into existence suddenly. During times of peace workers have long demanded that their physical well being and their labor power should be conserved and that they should be granted real freedom to organize to make these demands effective. There is not a single nation that has generously and unreservedly granted these rights to the wage earners. By such a policy every nation assumes responsibility for national peril and foregoes its right to full and free patriotic sacrifices from its citizens.

A nation which fails to stimulate and to develop qualities which work for voluntary associated effort for the common welfare condemns its citizens to stultifying practices and effects of compulsion. Preparedness in national resources, whether for war or peace, is secondary to the development of national characteristics which underlie fundamental preparedness for life and growth. There must be some strong force dedicated to the cause of humanity that shall compel the incorporation of these truths in national policy—there must be industrial and humanitarian statesmanship as well as political. Even now the great industrial interests are planning to protect themselves in the convulsive shock that will come at the end of the present European war, when present currents of industry and commerce will be suddenly changed.

The citizen wage earners of our country will be in as great need of protection as industries and commerce. Methods and policies must be devised in advance. The wage earners are entitled to participate in determining these matters which so vitally concern them.—American Federationist.

Tearing Sounds.

The ear can be trained to accustom itself to the sound of the tearing of various materials. The noise accompanying the tearing of cotton is unlike that of linen. The warp has its voice and the filling quite another, the former being shrill, while the latter is apt to be dull.

Economy.

Mere parsimony is not economy. Expense, and great expense, may be an essential part in true economy.

THE MINIMUM WAGE.

Good Thing For Women, but Male Workers Do Not Need It.

Discussing the question of a minimum wage, John Mitchell, former head of the United Mine Workers and now chairman of the New York industrial commission, said:

I believe the legislature should have the power to fix a minimum wage for women and children, but not for men, because the men are able to take care of themselves through their unions. Unfortunately the women do not organize as the men do, and many a woman enters the industrial pursuits with the ultimate hope of becoming a home maker and is not so anxious to secure industrial rights through organization.

Wages for women now are lowered by girls who are supported at home, but who go to work to get what might be termed pin money to expend upon themselves and who do not aid in the support of their homes. This class of working girls is harmful to the class who are compelled to support themselves by their work, as they keep the latter's wages down. There is no demand for a minimum wage for men, and if you put such a provision in the revised constitution the laboring vote might defeat the whole instrument.

The fond parent looked up hopelessly.

"I can't, my son; I've tried everything," answered the baldheaded father.—Exchange.

PINCHOT BACKS LABOR.

Industrial Absolutism Rules by Brute Force, He Says.

"Labor and the Future" was the subject of an address by Amos Pinchot of New York at a labor mass meeting held recently at Denver. The meeting was held as a protest of the conviction of John Lawson of the United Mine Workers.

Mr. Pinchot said he was not an apostle of labor and really belonged to the "other camp." His address was filled with denunciation of the methods of certain employers.

"Industrial absolutism," he said, "ushers in a reign of blood and horror and turns to the world and cries, 'How long, O Lord, will labor raise the sword and perish by the sword?' The unlawful violation of the strikers' rights or liberties to a point beyond endurance has become a trump card that is almost invariably played to divert the controversy from the real issue.

"If the great employers of labor in Colorado had even a brief sparkle of vision or imagination they would see by the conviction of John Lawson that they have gone too far. They are sowing the wind. In trying to bind down labor by brute force without regard to justice absolutism is weaving a rope of sand which will part even before it is securely in place."

Mr. Pinchot also said that in the Colorado act authorizing the appointment of a special judge to try the miners' cases "and the selection of a Colorado Fuel and Iron company partisan the full height of hypocritical unfairness has been reached."

Here Is Style Originality

Not merely eccentricity of design, but a skilful blending of line and curve, a harmony of proportion that insensibly gives you the impression that this suit is different. The model illustrated is a fair example of the results achieved this season by the artist designers of Printzess suits. A wide assortment of their best work is on exhibition in our ready-to-wear department.

CHILDREN TO PARADE TODAY

The Line of 5000 Children, Flower Bedecked, Will Be a Feature of the Ka-Noo-no Karnival.

A goodly number of Fulton's population have visited the State fair this week and incidentally taken in the parades in the evening. The best program, however, of the entire week is scheduled for today, when 5,000 school children will take part in the floral parade, tonight's feature attraction in connection with the Ka-noo-no Karnival.

"It will be the greatest children's pageant ever seen in Syracuse, if only we get the weather," said Henry J. Ormsbee, director of the karnival, last evening. "We could easily use 7,000 children, but we haven't enough costumes. It is sure to be bright and beauteous spectacle, and this feature has always been among the most popular with fair visitors. The little folks will be reviewed by Governor Whitman in addition to the regular committee." Bearing thousands of strands and pieces of artificial as well as natural flowers, the school pupils, are sure to present a sight that will evoke a feeling of pride in the hearts of the people. Each section of the huge parade will be divided into units, each having a separate color and flower scheme. As the line courses through the streets the effect of great moving gardens will be given. The line will be interspersed by numerous bands and many of the schools will enter handsomely decked floats.

Men have actually wept upon seeing the beautifully costumed children in parade in past years. Traveling men, stopping off in Syracuse, proudly admitting that they could not restrain from tears.

Extra cars have been promised by the Empire United Railways, and it is hoped the promise will be fulfilled. Usually, the "S. R. O." has been the chief fly in the ointment for the people who are brave enough to sojourn to the field of spectacle.

ERIE ST. BOYS PREPARE TO WAR

'Twill be Directed Against Pig Skin Chasers, However, and Not Teutons and Allies.

Usually, with the advent of cool weather, the young man's thoughts "lightly turn to" football and the various indoor winter pastimes, but whether the hot weather of the past two days has turned the heads of some of our school boys or that they are anxious to "rush the season" cannot be told. However, the Erie st. school football team has donned its war togs and now announce that they will meet all comers averaging 85 pounds. The team, captained by Fitzgeralds, carried away the gridiron honors of Fulton grammar grade schools last year and intend to win every game this year. Signal practice has been held at the school every day for the past couple of weeks and the team is already well organized. The regular line-up as announced is: Center, Jennings; guards, Streeter and Tyrrel; tackles, Mirskey and Childs; ends, Trombly and Quirk; quarterback, Fitzgeralds (Capt.); left halfback, Lamphere; fullback, Pierce; right halfback, Salsbury.

"Buck" Green, who coached the team last year, will be asked to give his services this year. Teams desiring to place the Erie school boys on their schedule are advised to communicate with Captain Fitzgeralds at the school.

DAY OF ATONEMENT A MOST SACRED DAY

Saturday, Sept. 18, will be observed by the Jewish people of Oswego, Syracuse, Fulton and elsewhere as the Day of Atonement, a time for inner thoughts upon the sins of life and confessions of faults, and the Jewish residents of this city will in most cases attend services in Syracuse. Opening services will be held Friday evening when a ritual will be read.

The ritual of the day expresses a desire to attain moral will and common sympathy. In the religious creed fasting means a discipline of self-control. The public confession of sins is an act of will revealing one's best self, and these are the sentiments which the day attempts to bring out. The recollection of the dead is one phase of the ritual used in connection with the observances of the day. At this time each person is made to think of the sorrow which comes into his life because of the loss of his kindred. In an effort to teach that one should better himself the great leaders of the world are brought to mind. This day also emphasizes good will and repentance.

DAISY COOPER TO SING AT THE QUIRK TONIGHT

Miss Cooper, seven years old, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Cooper, 410 Oak st. She has won nine first prizes for her singing at the amateur performances and her friends anticipate a few more coming to her.

SPEAKER WANTS LARGER FAIR

[illegible] C. [illegible]

When Speaker Sweet attended the State Fair the other day he made a thorough inspection of the grounds and the exhibits and began to realize what many other visitors who have preceded him in other years were not so quick to discern—that the State Fair has not had proper support from the state.

"I would like to see the original plan for the development of the fair, along the lines laid down when Governor Hughes was in office, carried out to the letter," Speaker Sweet said. "I am in favor of appropriations with that end in view. You can make that as strong as you like."

The Green & Wicks plan, the one to which Speaker Sweet referred, has been executed in part, through the construction of the Liberal Arts, State Institutions, Dairy, Cattle and Poultry buildings. New buildings for horticulture and floriculture, a coliseum for the horse show and cattle judging and a change in the location of the race track and grandstand.

Today was Education day at the fair with an address at noon by State Commissioner of Education John H. Finley on Potatoes and Boys, the idea he expressed being that you cannot grow good potatoes without cultivation and that likewise you cannot grow good boys without good schools.

"In my imagination," said Dr. Finley, "a million boys are gathered around this band stand; the school boys of this state. I wish you could see them (and them illion school girls with them). What they by cultivation have become is as different from what they might have been as the 'Early Rose is from the potato that grows wild and acrid in the Andes. But what they may become through the disciplines of still better schools and the culture of still better homes, no earthly premium can measure. It is more than all else thatt his State Fair exhibits. It is more than all else that this great state produces. It is not less than this state raised to 'infinity.'"

MOSQUITOES MADE AERIAL RAID YESTERDAY

An army of nearly twenty billion mosquitoes, commanded by special officers of the State of Jersey, swooped down upon this city yesterday. In nearly every ward of the city people capitulated completely, but in the neighborhood of City Hall the pedestrians made a strong fight, holding places on the sidewalks until driven to shelter.

Chief Dyer reports that a strong contingent of the enemy came over the city from Lake Neahtawanta, attacking the members of his department who were on duty last night. This morning every member of the force reported close shaves and no one missing, although eighteen billion of the enemy received military funerals.

CONCRETE BRIDGE GETTING FINAL TOUCHES

The concrete foundation of the new Sixth street bridge is completed and the finishing touches will be put on the bridge this week. Yesterday twenty men, together with several teams, were engaged in leveling the approach to the bridge. Sixth street in this neighborhood, heretofore in bad condition, will be after the present work is completed be in as good condition as some of the paved streets. For a distance of 100 yards, north and south of the bridge, the laborers are excavating and filling in. The transfer of hundreds of cubic yards of dirt will be necessary before the work under way is entirely finished.

SEASON ON STRAW HATS WAS CLOSED YESTERDAY

Although the official straw hat season closed yesterday, a trip along E. 1st st. rialto this morning, produced the information that if the present warm weather continued beyond noon time today a large number of Fulton men would ignore the season and continue to wear Panamas and straws for a few days longer in utter defiance of the decree of the man whose duty it is to fire a gun at the straws.

The late cold snap brought out the felts and caps but for this week the straw hats have had the best of the argument and most wearers of them say they prefer to remain alive in comfort.

WENDELL'S BIG AUCTION SALE

The auction sale of the Wendell jewelry stock opened Tuesday evening The store was packed to the doors with a crowd of eager buyers, and for an hour Auctioneer Mitchell literally gave goods away. The auctioneer's announcement that he would sell without any reserve everything that was offered was amply verified.

Notable among the evenings' bargains were a half dozen Gorham Chantilly sterling teaspoons that brought only $1.40, although the regular price was $7.50. A large chime clock, usually sold for $16.00, brought only $1.00. A chest of Rogers' silverware of 26 pieces, listed at $30.00, sold for only $3.00. An Elgin watch that was priced at $24.00, sold for $7.00.

These bargains furnish all the proof necessary that this sale is bona fide and that the stock is to be sold, no matter what the loss. Mr. Wendell assures us that there will be no additions to his stock of auction goods but only his regular goods will be offered, the same high grade goods that have built up and maintained the reputation of the Wendell store for so many years.

A pleasant feature of this sale is that customers are allowed to make their own selections from any part of the stock, and that whatever is offered is sold for any price that can be secured.

The fact that Mr. Mitchell, the auctioneer, is a man of national reputation, having conducted some of the largest and most important jewelry auction sales in this country and Canada, and that he has the indorsement of the largest jobbers, trade associations and the National Jewelers Co-operative Syndicate, insures patrons of this sale courteous treatment, reputable business methods and a delightful entertainment.

We predict for this sale an unqualified success. Adv.

WOOLWORTH CONTRIBUTES TO M. E. CHURCH

Watertown, Sept. 15.—The presentation of the Woolworth Memorial Methodist Episcopal church to the trustees and congregation by F. W. Woolworth and the dedication of it to the service of God by Bishop John W. Hamilton, D. D., LL. D., of Boston, took place at Great Bend this morning. The pretty little edifice was crowded to its capacity while the services took place.

At the presentation Mr. Woolworth announced that he would help maintain the church by a gift of $20,000 in bonds, which would stand as an endowment. He said that he expected the congregation to aid in the maintenance of the church, but that he did not wish it to become a burden on the trustees and the community.

RECEIVER DISCHARGED IN BANKRUPTCY CASE

Attorney F. S. Spangle, receiver for Abraham Aroneck, bankrupt, was yesterday discharged by Judge Ray, in United States Court at Syracuse. A trustee will be elected today in Oswego before Referee Wright. Mr. Aroneck is a dry goods merchant on the west side and the bankruptcy case has been dragging a long time.

NEWSPAPER SAYS HARTNETT IS SANGUINE

Yesterday's Palladium contained the following:

"Former County Chairman W. J. Hartnett, of the Democratic County Committee, who was in the city yesterday afternoon with two of his chief lieutenants, George Pomphret and H. J. Fanning, says that Myron F. Foster will surely be elected as the next Mayor of Fulton over "Vic" Lewis, the Republican candidate. Mr. Foster is the third of that name to go to the electors as a candidate for Mayor in the last dozen years. The other two were J. A. and J. M. Foster, both of whom were elected. The latter two are no relation to the present candidate."

OUR WATERSHEDS ARE UNIQUE

Send Waters to St. Lawrence and Gulf of Mexico.

CONNECTED BY CANALS.

Canal Improvement Made Necessary by Competing Waterways to the North of Us.

In order to understand the canal system of New York state it is necessary to know something about the watersheds into which the state is divided. It is probable that nowhere in the United States is there a more unique or remarkable situation than there is in the state of New York. Rivers which rise in this state empty into the ocean at points as far distant as the gulf of St. Lawrence and the gulf of Mexico, and every important bay along the Atlantic coast, the great lakes watershed system, including Lake Champlain, the Seneca river and Lake Ontario, meets the Hudson system near Rome, with but a few miles between navigable water in both systems and with no high range or hills between. This is also remarkable that between the different river valleys in New York state the hills are lower than they are in Pennsylvania or any other eastern state. It is easier, therefore, to build the canal crossing the watershed from one river valley to another in this state than in any other state on the Atlantic coast.

The early canal development in New York state contemplated the connecting up of all these different watersheds. The Erie canal, with the Champlain and Oswego, connected the great lakes system directly with the Atlantic ocean, the Genesee valley canal branch of the Erie reaching the Allegheny river and through it the Ohio and Mississippi. The Chenango valley canal, also branching from the Erie, reached the Susquehanna. The Chemung canal, starting from the southern end of Seneca lake, also reaches the Susquehanna through the Chemung river. The watersheds of the Atlantic coast in New York state, of the Susquehanna, of the Mississippi and of the great lakes were thus connected.

After the country had been cleared and the lumber and other early products taken out there was little business to move on the north and south lines, but the great development of the west offered and still offers a tremendous freight tonnage for the main line of the Erie canal. There are only three gaps in the Appalachian range of mountains through which navigation is or can be made possible. Canadians have one in the St. Lawrence. We have the best of all in the Mohawk-Hudson valley, and the southern route is so difficult that it was abandoned many years ago. The railroad service between the great lakes and the ocean is unable to compete with the Canadian route. If New York state wishes to continue to haul the goods from the great west through its boundaries it must complete its canal. A vote for the canal referendum bill this fall will insure continued prosperity to the state of New York.

WILL ATTRACT NEW INDUSTRIES

Good Transportation Facilities of the Barge Canal.

Nearly every enterprising city and town in the state of New York is trying to attract new industries. In many of the cities organizations are employing trained men to present the merits of the particular locality to manufacturers and newcomers who may be induced to locate there.

One of the most important arguments that can be used with a manufacturer to induce him to locate in any particular town is the argument that the town in question has good transportation facilities and that its freight rates are fair.

The state of New York is now building this new barge canal, the main object of which is to create in all of the towns which it touches a favorable situation in regard to freight rates. The canal with its branches extends 700 miles through the state of New York. It reaches almost all of the principal cities and towns of the state. Eighty-five per cent of the population of the state live close to the barge canal, and the freight rates of fully 95 per cent of the people of the state will be affected by the canal.

Comparing New York state with all of the other states in the eastern part of the country, the completion of the barge canals, with the consequent adjustment of freight rates which will have to follow, will make this state and every town in this state a better location for manufacturing than can be found elsewhere.

The completion and successful operation, therefore, of the barge canals ought to and will result in developing 700 miles of good industrial territory, thus adding immensely to the wealth and population of New York state. The completion of these canals depends on the vote at the coming election of the canal referendum bond issue. Every town which is desirous of growing, of adding more manufactures and more wealth, should return an overwhelming majority for the referendum.

CELEBRATING A GREAT EVENT

New Yorkers of 1825 Appreciated Need of Erie Canal.

Ninety years ago this fall—to be more exact, in October, 1825—New York state had the greatest celebration in its history. It was the occasion of the completion of the Erie canal between Buffalo and New York. The newspapers of that long past time gave the celebration nearly all of their space. It seemed to the state of New York then the most important achievement in the world. The accounts of that famous celebration read like exaggerations, and yet there is no question as to how the people of that day regarded the task which they had finished. It was to their mind the greatest thing which had happened on the American continent since its discovery.

After ninety years we are again confronted with the canal problem. Present day conditions demanded an enlargement of the whole canal. The state undertook that enlargement in 1903, and after twelve years and with the work nearly finished the funds have been exhausted.

At the coming election the most important question to be voted upon is the bond issue, which will provide funds for the immediate completion of the work.

The extravagant expectations of the people in 1825 as to the value of their great canal were fulfilled many times over. The increase in wealth and population of the state of New York which followed the opening of the Erie canal in 1825 was greater than any similar increase in American history. If the people of the state vote again, as they have voted many times in the past, to go ahead with the canal work and this time bring it to a successful completion, there is no question but what the results will again warrant all of the labor and cost which the canal system has taken, nor is there any question but what a new industrial development of New York state will bring untold wealth and prosperity to the people who very wisely for a century have kept and enlarged the canal system.

LOCAL DOG "DIXIE" TOOK HONORS AT STATE FAIR

Dick III, a French bull dog, owned by George B. Moore, of 324 Utica st., won two seconds and the winners' reserve ribbon at the dog show held in with the State Fair yesterday.

In the class of novice dogs, Dick III took second honors, and in the class for dogs, limit, also won the red ribbon. In the winner's class the Fulton entry carried off second honors and was awarded the winner's reserve ribbon. The performance of the local dog was remarkable, in view of the large entry list, and the fact that this was the first time he had been benched. The show will continue today under the direction of officials of the American Kennel Association.

It will be remembered by many that "Dixie," as Dick III, is called, featured in an escapade last winter with little Miss Spencer's handsome white Angora cat, "Mutty" by name.

GRANBY MAN'S BODY FOUND IN THE TAIL RACE

The body of John Cassidy of South Granby was found floating in the tail race of the Victoria paper mills shortly before noon today by Fred Martin, an employe of the paper company. The body was removed to Young's undertaking parlors at once and will remain to await identification.

The body has been in the water for several days and was badly decomposed. There were sveeral cards and letters in the pockets of the clothing, but the writing had been almost obliterated by the water. The man is between 35 and 40 years of age, about five feet eight inches in height, blue eyes, sandy hair and moustache, and wore a grey suit and black shoes.

UNCLE'S TOM'S CABIN.

There has never been so lavish and adequate production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" as that which Mr. Burgess will offer amusement lovers at The Quirk, matinee and night, tomorrow.

The scenes which are large enough to fill the most spacious stage could not easily be improved. Those representing the Ohio river in winter, the rocky pass in which George Harris protects his family, the St. Claire plantation, the levee at New Orleans, the cotton fields in full bloom, and the "Celectial City" are all most notable effects. Each pictures the reality as closely as paint and canvas will permit and the stage prospective is so deep that the effect is exceptionally pleasing. The company is also worthy of the environment. Tom Atkins, the eminent minsrtel star, offers an excellent study of Uncle Tom.

E. and G. A. Rappole, returned home this morning. The trip was made by automobile. They attended the State Fair while here.

DAVID KATZ DENIES WOOLWORTH RUMOR

A rumor that the Woolworth syndicate of 5 and 10 cent stores had completed arrangements to occupy half of the Katz building here, was denied this morning by David Katz, of the local company, who classed the report as "street talk." The Woolworth company, it is reported, has completed plans for the erection of a 15-story building in Watertown.

CRONK—JENNINGS.

At a house wedding last night Miss Vivian Jennings, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. W. Jennings, of 611 Manhattan avenue, became the bride of Mr. Earl F. Cronk, of 608 South 4th st. The ceremony was performed in the Jennings home by the Rev. Mr. Holmes and was attended by relatives and friends of the bride and groom. The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Cronk, of 609 South 4th st., and is employed at the plant of the Oswego River Power and Transmission Company.

The ceremony took place at 7 o'clock after which the guests partook of dinner. The evening was spent in dancing, the music being furnished by Mrs. Martin and Mr. L. Jennings, Mrs. Martin playing the organ, accompanied by Mr. Jennings on the violin.

The house was elobarotely decorated for the occasion with Chinese asters. Japanese lanterns were strung throughout the house. Candles surrounded the wedding cake, brilliantly illuminated the interior. After a brief wedding tour the couple will reside in Fulton.

LEAVES TONIGHT.

William Wood, President of the American Woolen Company, who has been the guest of John W. Stevenson, factor at the local mills, for several days, will return to Boston tonight. During his stay in this section Mr. Wood stopped at the Onondaga in Syracuse and was an interested visitor at the State Fair.

How to Write Advertising Copy

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

A SKILLED layer of mosaic works with small fragments of stone—they fit into more places than the larger chunks.

The skilled advertiser works with small words—they fit into more minds than big phrases.

The simpler the language the greater certainty that it will be understood by the least intelligent reader.

The construction engineer plans his roadbed where there is a minimum of grade—he works along the lines of least resistance.

The advertisement which runs into mountainous style is badly surveyed—all minds are not built for high grade thinking.

Advertising must be simple. When it is tricked out with the jewelry and silks of literary expression, it looks as much out of place as a ball dress at the breakfast table!

The buying public is only interested in facts. People read advertisements to find out what you have to sell.

The advertiser who can fire the most facts in the shortest time gets the most returns. Blank cartridges make noise but they do not hit—blank talk, however clever, is only wasted space.

You force your salesmen to keep to solid facts—you don't allow them to sell muslin with quotations from Omar or trousers with excerpts from Marie Corelli. You must not tolerate in your printed selling talk anything that you are not willing to countenance in personal salesmanship.

Cut out clever phrases if they are inserted to the sacrifice of clear explanations—write copy as you talk. Only be more brief. Publicity is costlier than conversation—ranging in price downward from $10 a line; talk is not cheap, but the most expensive commodity in the world.

Sketch in your ad to the stenographer. Then you will be so busy "saying it" that you will not have time to bother about the gewgaws of writing. Afterwards take the typewriten manuscript and cut out every word and every line that can be erased without omiting an important detail. What remains in the end is all that really counted in the beginning.

Cultivate brevity and simplicity. "Savon Français" may look smarter, but more people will understand "French Soap." Sir Isaac Newton's explanation of gravitation covers six pages but the schoolboy's terse and homely "What goes up must come down" clinches the whole thing in six words.

Indefinite talk wastes space. It is not 100% productive. The copy that omits prices sacrifices half its pulling power—it has a tendency to bring lookers instead of buyers. It often creates false impressions. Some people are bound to conceive the idea that the goods are higher priced than in reality—others, by the same token, are just as likely to infer that the prices are lower and go away thinking that you have exaggerated your statements.

The reader must be searched out by the copy. Big space is cheapest because it doesn't waste a single eye. Publicity must be on the offensive. There are far too many advertisers who keep their lights on top of their bushel—the average citizen hasn't time to overturn your bushel.

Small space is expensive. Like a one-flake snowstorm, there is not enough of it to lay.

Space is a comparative matter after all. It is not a case of how much is used but how it is used. The passengers on the limited express may realize that Jones has tacked a twelve-inch shingle on every post and fence for a stretch of five miles, but they are going too fast to make out what the shingles say, yet the two-feet letters of Brown's big bulletin board on top of the hill leap at them before they have a chance to dodge it. And at that it doesn't cost nearly so much as the sum total of Jones' dinky display.

Just so advertisements attractively displayed every day or every week for a year in one newspaper will find the eye of all readers, no matter how rapidly they may be "going" through the advertising pages, and produce more results than a dozen piking pieces of copy scattered through half a dozen papers.

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

Ambrose Peale, press agent, meets Rodney, and agrees to go into business with the lad on a salary basis. Rodney has resolved to go into the soap industry and buck the trust.

Rodney, Peale and Mary go into the soap trade together. Rodney then endeavors to borrow $10,000 as capital for his newly formed company.

it was warm and delicate. No faded blue for theirs. What did it? Power of suggestion—advertising."

"You seem to know something about it," Rodney said aloud.

"I not only seem to, I do," Peale agreed. "Just before I met you I told a young fellow downstairs that 'The Belle of Broadway' was the biggest hit in town. Ask him to go to the theater, give him his choice and I'll bet you $4 to a fried egg he picks 'The Belle of Broadway.' Advertising!"

"I don't believe it," Rodney protested.

"Well, try it. And, say, what makes you go to the theater yourself? I'll tell you. It's what you've read about the play or what some fellow's told you."

"Why, I suppose that's true," said Rodney, beginning to be convinced a little. "But I never read advertisements."

"Oh, you don't, eh? Say, what kind of garters do you wear?"

"Why, let me see. The ——," said Rodney.

"Exactly," said Peale. "What do you know about 'em? Nothing. Are

"An actor? I should say not. I'm a press agent."

they any better than any other garter? You don't know—I don't know, but all my life every magazine I've ever looked into has had a picture of a man's leg with a certain kind of garter on it, the ——. So when I go into a store to buy a pair of garters I just naturally say ——. So do you. You don't read advertisements? Rot!"

"But"— said Rodney.

"No 'but' about it," answered Peale. "Advertising's responsible for everything. When Bryan advertised grape juice do you know that its sale went up 652 gallons a day?"

"You don't really mean it?"

"I do."

"But 652 gallons. How do you know it was 652?" asked Rodney.

"I'll let you into a little secret," confided Peale. "I don't know a thing about grape juice—and as long as my health and strength keep up I hope I never shall—but if I said I'd read in a newspaper that the sale had gone up 652 gallons you wouldn't have doubted it, would you?"

"No, I suppose I shouldn't," Rodney agreed.

"And you'd have told somebody else, and he'd have believed you too," went on Peale.

CHAPTER VI.
Chasing Capital.

"WHAT kind of eggs do you eat?" Peale asked Rodney.

"Why, hen's eggs, of course," Rodney laughed.

"Did you ever eat a duck egg?" asked Peale.

"Why, no," said Rodney. "At any rate, not often."

"Do you know anything against the duck?"

"No."

"Exactly. When a duck lays an egg it's a —— fool and keeps quiet about it. but when a hen does, my boy—cluck, cluck, all over the place. Advertising! So you eat hen's eggs."

"You're beginning to convince me," laughed Rodney. He was beginning to get excited.

"You really believe that with proper advertising you could build up a great business?" he asked.

"Believe! Look around you. Everything's doing it," declared Peale.

"Do you want to work for me?"

"Sure! Now."

"What's your salary?" asked Rodney, the new business man.

"I've been getting $60, but I'm worth $75," said Peale quickly.

"I'll give you $100," Rodney told him.

"What's your business—counterfeiting?" asked Peale skeptically.

"No, it's"— began Rodney.

"Don't tell me," Peale interrupted. "As long as it doesn't send me to state prison or the chair it's all right. Could I have about $25 advance on salary now?"

"Oh, all right," said Rodney, handing him the money.

"Just as an evidence of good faith," Peale explained, counting the crisp bills. "Well, now, I'm working for you. What business are you in?" he began again.

"The soap business," said Rodney boldly.

"Nice clean business. With father?" asked Peale, grinning.

"Against him," explained Rodney.

"Oh!" said Peale.

Rodney reminded him that he and his father had had a quarrel, and Peale agreed very sympathetically that fathers were very unreasonable these days.

Finally Peale commented, "Do you know why your father is the soap king?"

"I suppose because he controls all the soap business in the country except one," said Rodney.

"Exactly, and the way he keeps control of it is by buying out all his live competitors. And now here's a blue ribbon champion-of the world scheme. Why don't we make good and sell out to father?"

"No; I don't care to do that. I want to make good myself," said Rodney.

"Well, if father is forced to buy you out, isn't that enough? What do you want?" asked Peale.

"I've got to be a success myself. I've got to show father and Miss Grayson," explained Rodney. He went on further:

"You see father says I can't earn $5 a week."

"He isn't right, is he?" queried Peale.

"No, sir; you'll see," Rodney answered proudly.

"I hope so," said Peale dryly. "At that it's a pretty tough job selling soap if father's against us."

"I suppose it is," Rodney agreed.

When poor Rodney trotted out the story of the cookbook Peale wanted to know if he was "kidding him," but grew less skeptical when he heard all there was to hear about the cheapest soap in the world. It was a good line, he said, the cheapest soap. How could they use it? he inquired, pausing and thinking deeply, while Rodney was lost in business meditation too.

Suddenly Rodney called out:

"Peale, I've got an entirely different idea."

"Well, don't be selfish. Share it with me," said his partner.

"Why do the people jam the cabarets where they only serve champagne," began Rodney excitedly. "Why do they crowd the restaurants where they put up a rope to keep you out? Why do they sit in the sixteenth row in the orchestra when they could have the third row in the balcony? Why do they buy imported clothes? Why do they ride in French automobiles? Because they're better? No; because they're expensive—because they cost more money. So all the sheep think they ought to be better. My boy, listen—'the most expensive soap in the world!'"

"My boy, I could kiss you!" cried Peale delightedly. "A pupil after my own heart—50 cents a cake!" cried Peale.

"A dollar, and we'll make it a warm, delicate old rose," sang Rodney.

"Each cake in a separate box, with a paper rose on the lid," said Peale. "But what shall we call it?"

"Old rose," suggested Rodney after a moment.

"Rotten—doesn't mean anything," rejected Peale.

"Let's think," said Rodney.

"I am thinking. I never stop," said Peale.

"The soap that made Pittsburgh clean," said Rodney.

"Too long. You need something catchy."

"I had an idea awhile ago," said Rodney—"the People's Soap."

"Not if you're going to catch the rich boobs," said Peale.

Then suddenly Rodney remembered the legend in the old cookbook and cried out:

"Wait, wait! Listen! Listen close! The 13 Soap. Unlucky for Dirt."

"Son," said Peale joyously, "it's all over. The old man'll be on his knees in a month."

"We open the office Monday," Rodney sang out.

"You see father says I can't earn $5 a week."

"Where's the office?" Peale inquired.

"Let's get one," said Rodney.

"With furniture and everything," said Peale, "and, say, you'd better call up your tailor and order a couple of business suits."

After this manner began the business of the great 13 Soap Company, which was to bring the Soap King Cyrus Martin to his knees and make Rodney a rich man in his own right so he could marry Mary Grayson.

The office of the soap company was opened with Mary working for the concern.

From time to time an undersecretary or subtypewriter stuck her head through the door and announced some one. This young person opened the door now suddenly and announced with mingled glee and curiosity:

"The Countess de Bowreen!"

Money, when you are chasing it up in the form of capital, is a real will o' the wisp. Now you see it within your grasp, and again your gaze is quite blank. None of the three conspirators in the room realized what was to come of the French and titled lady's interruption and only looked upon her as an inconvenient bore, to be disposed of as best could be.

"Oh, that dreadful woman again," sighed Mary.

The countess entered and came over to Rodney at once, speaking to him in French:

"Vous etes Monsieur Martin?" she cooed.

Rodney nodded.

"Ah, cher Monsieur Martin—je suis enchantee de vous voir."

"The dame's loony," said Peale in an aside to Mary.

Woman's World

Wife of New Secretary of State Occupies Mother's Former Place.

MRS. ROBERT LANSING.

Not since the days when Mrs. John Hay entertained official Washington as wife of the secretary of state has a cabinet hostess of this rank appeared who is as well equipped as Mrs. Robert Lansing, wife of President Wilson's new premier.

Mrs. Lansing will enjoy the unique experience of succeeding to the very exacting social duties which were so ably performed by her mother back in the Harrison administration when John W. Foster, her father, was secretary of state.

Mrs. Lansing, then Eleanor Foster, was just making her bow in society, having been graduated from Smith college. Her interest in her mother's duties was sufficient to give her an experience which she will now be able to turn to practical advantage.

The wife of the secretary of state is called upon for many exacting social duties, and Washington expects to see Mrs. Lansing make a notable place for herself as a cabinet hostess. She is a good conversationalist, quick at repartee and somewhat of a wit. Furthermore, Mrs. Lansing is the youngest woman upon whom the duty of leading the cabinet's social affairs has fallen in many years.

Mrs. Lansing was married to Mr. Lansing in 1890 in the home of her father on I street, where the Fosters lived for many years. The Lansing wedding was attended by a notable gathering, including President Harrison and family, Vice President Morton and his family and other prominent officials and diplomats.

Mr. Lansing took his bride to a new home in Watertown, N. Y., where they have always lived except for the time spent in Washington. They spent many winters with General and Mrs. Foster before Mr. Lansing was appointed counselor of the state department, and since then they have continued to make their home with the Fosters, who have built a spacious and luxurious home on Eighteenth street, just opposite the Austro-Hungarian embassy, in Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. Lansing have no children.

Mrs. Lansing as the foremost of the cabinet wives will take precedence over many other women. She will take the lead in all things social in the cabinet circle. In social rank she comes next to the wife of the president or the president's hostess. Even the wife of the vice president does not have the social responsibility of the wife of the secretary of state. It is her duty to entertain the diplomatic corps, and it is to her that the wives and families of newly accredited ambassadors and ministers pay their respects after they have made their formal calls at the White House.

The most brilliant function of New Year's day next to the White House reception is the breakfast given by the secretary of state and his wife to the diplomatic corps.

Mrs. Lansing is known in Washington as a woman of exceptionally good taste, modesty and common sense.

Ways to Clean Silver.

One of the easiest ways to clean silver is to wash it with a soft cloth saturated with kerosene, then rinse it with scalding water. A long bath in sour milk will clean badly tarnished silver. If vinegar cruets are filled with it and left awhile the films on the inside will soon disappear.

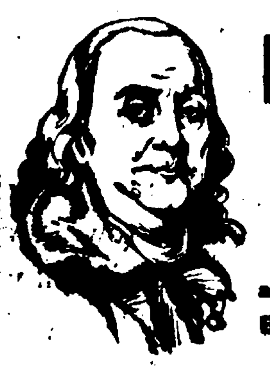
Alcohol and salt will remove egg stains immediately, and alcohol and soda is also a good cleanser. Many prefer using alcohol to ammonia, though the latter does the work.

A chamois bag filled with powdered magnesia is very useful for polishing all silver articles. An old piece of velvet will prove wonderful for polishing silver, and a broken clothespin is a handy contrivance. Covered with a cloth, the flat, rounded tip will be more useful in working between the tines of the work and in moldings that require more friction than a brush can give.

Button Hooks.

For 5 cents buttonhooks with white bone handles can be bought. A supply of these might be laid in by many a housewife to advantage, for every room ought to be furnished with at least one shoe buttoner. Nothing is so aggravating as to be unable to find one's [illegible].

Economy Hints



A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

ARTICLES that are worn more or less evenly in all parts are best not patched, because, the surplus material of the patch being newer than that of the garment, it will only stain or tear it.

When patching is referred to as repairing it implies putting in entire new portions of a garment, such as bands, cuffs, collars and facings, and is best learned from the ways of making the garment. The ordinary patching is cutting out worn or torn parts and putting in better material. The patch must be of the same substance, color and quality as the original material.

Entirely new material, being stronger than the garment, should not be used. If partly worn pieces are not available it is best to choose thinner material. Wash fabrics should always be washed before using. Dresses generally lose some of the original color through wearing, and one may fade a patch in the sun to the right tone before using. The first principle in patching is to have the patch show as little as possible when finished.

In inserting a patch care must be taken to have the warp of patch and article run in the one direction. Selvages usually all run lengthwise on garments because the warp threads have more strength. When the position of the selvage cannot readily be determined pull the material in different ways; the stronger or warp threads will yield and stretch less than the woof; or fray out a few threads and you will find the warp smooth against a wavy appearance in the woof.

There are many ways of preparing and setting in these patches, but a few usual rules are to be observed. The widths of hems (suited to the thickness of the material) must be the same at each side; the corners must be firmly and securely sewed; the patch must be on the wrong side when finished.

An easy method is to hem the patch on the wrong side and then fell it on the right. Strike or mark on the right side of the material where it is to be cut away, then mark (on the right side) for the seam allowance, usually about one-quarter inch; lastly mark the actual width of the fell according to the thickness of the material. This last marking or striking is on the wrong side, as that is where the patch is to be sewed on.

NEAT FOOTWEAR.

The Fad Styles Should Be Avoided by Women.

Regarding footwear, one cannot lay too much stress on the fact that it is one of the most important features of feminine wardrobe this season. Nevertheless the woman of good taste will disregard the many fad stockings and shoes offered to her and will select quiet, elegant pedal coverings that will distinguish her from the great mass who rush in where angels fear to tread.

It is perfectly good taste to wear the spats of white, of tan or pale gray with the morning or afternoon costume. With the latter, however, may be worn a low shoe of white, of gray or black kid—according to the costume—with trimmings of a contrasting color.

It is always better judgment to have the hosiery match the color of the dress or suit. This makes less awkward, in effect, the woman to whom the very short skirt is not becoming, and it makes less conspicuous the unshapely ankle which offends the eye of the esthetic.

After several seasons of buckle ornamentation an era of simple lacings or bow decoration has set in. Very few buckles are seen even in connection with the dancing slipper. Bronze vamps with champagne uppers are among the novelties offered for wear with the demi costume. They continue the color scheme of the costume and thus counteract the grotesque line of the very short skirt.

Shoe trees have improved vastly within the last few seasons. To a very large extent the wooden forms have been supplanted by those of metal.

Orange Mint Relish.

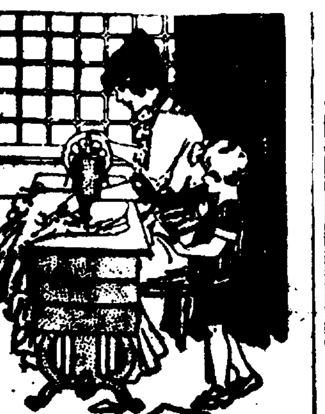
Take four large oranges, peel carefully, slice and cut into cubes the size of dice. Add an equal amount of pineapple prepared as above, sprinkle with four tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, two tablespoonfuls of fine chopped mint, one tablespoonful of lemon juice and one tablespoonful of sherry wine. If the pineapple is not fully ripened crush enough to add a tablespoonful of the juice. Stir together lightly to prevent mashing the fruit. Serve in sherbet glasses cold and garnish with candied cherries or fresh cherries or other berries, as preferred.

Cottage Cheese Hint.

In making cottage cheese use an enameled ware colander in which to which to press it. Any milk product is very easily affected by its surroundings, and a metal colander may not only give a flavor, but is apt also to slightly darken the cheese, which should be of snowy whiteness.

After it has thoroughly drained add salt, a good sized piece of butter and a tablespoonful of sweet cream. Mix, cool on ice and serve while fresh.

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons



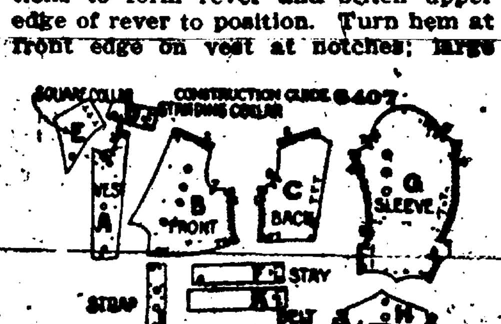
Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review

DEVELOPED ON VERY MODISH LINES.

A two-piece peplum may be added to the waist if desired; also a trimming of straps down either side of the front, to simulate the straight lines so much in vogue.

An exceedingly stylish costume for Autumn is shown here, developed in Hague blue chiffon poplin, trimmed with black panne velvet and embroidery. The full gathered skirt is joined to the waist under a girdle of velvet. Bright touches of green, gold and coral pink in the embroidery give a cheerful touch to the revers.

The entire costume calls for 5 yards 44-inch material, with 1 yard panne velvet for the trimming, but today's dressmaking lesson is limited to the construction of the waist. As no lining is required, the work will be appreciably simplified. The front edge of the front must be properly underfaced at the start, and this is about 1 inch inside of the line of small "o" perforations. Roll over on small "o" perforations to form rever and stitch upper edge of rever to position. Turn hem at front edge on vest at notches; large



"O" perforations indicate center-front. Adjust to position underneath front, bringing the folded edge of rever to line of small "o" perforations in vest, and stitch the back edge of vest to position invisibly to front section. Close under-arm and shoulder seams as notched. Gather lower edge of waist between double "TT" perforations and two inches above. Adjust stay to position underneath gathers.

For V-shaped neck it is necessary to cut out neck edge of vest on small "o" perforations. Now sew the square collar to neck edge, having the center-backs even and bring large "O" perforation to corresponding large "P" perforation in vest.

Coming to the sleeves, first pleat by bringing the "T" to corresponding small "o" perforations and tack. Close seams as notched, leaving extensions free; turn under extension on slot perforations, bring fold to small "o" perforations. Sew sleeve in armhole as notched, small "o" perforation at shoulder seam, easing in any fulness between double "TT" perforations.

ATTRACTIVE RECIPES.

PINEAPPLE PIE.—Pare and grate one large pineapple, add two cupfuls of sugar and two beaten eggs. Mix three tablespoonfuls of flour in with the sugar. Fill crusts, cover and bake. This makes two large pies.

Pineapple Sherbet.—One can of grated pineapple, one and one-half pints of sugar, one and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatin and the juice of two lemons. Dissolve the gelatin in a little cold water, then add to it one pint of boiling water. Let it cool, then pour one pint of cold water over the pineapple and strain through a sieve. Add sugar and lemons, also the yolks of four eggs for pink gelatin and only the white of the eggs when you use white gelatin. Freeze like ice cream, and if you do not call it good I shall fear that there is some deficiency in your sense of taste.

Fruit Fritters.—Beat yolks of two eggs slightly, add gradually one-half cupful of cold water and beat until light and foamy. Add one-half cupful of milk and mix well. Make a hole in center of one and one-half cupfuls of flour, to which has been added one-half teaspoonful salt; add liquid, slowly stirring all the time; beat until smooth; then add carefully one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder and the white of eggs beaten stiff. Fry in hot fat until brown.

Boiled Frosting.—One cupful granulated sugar, one-half cupful water, white of an egg, one-half teaspoonful of vanilla. Boil water and sugar together without stirring till it threads. Pour sirup gradually over white of an egg beaten stiff and dry, beating all the time. Add flavoring and continue stirring until right consistency to spread. Should not be made until ready to use. If beaten too long it will not be smooth; if not long enough it will run.

Braised Tongue.—Wash three pounds fresh tongue, cover with boiling water and cook slowly two hours. Remove from water, blanch in cold water and remove skin and roots. Cook one-quarter cupful each of diced carrots, turnips and onions in butter five minutes and remove them to a deep braising pan. Brown tongue in fat and place on vegetables on pan. If desired add clove, cinnamon and sweet herbs, salt and pepper, one clove, bit cinnamon, bouquet of sweet herbs, one teaspoonful salt, one-quarter teaspoonful pepper. Cover tongue one-half way with stock and bake in covered pan two hours. At the last half hour the juice of a lemon may be added. When tender remove to a hot platter. Thicken stock for gravy and pour around tongue on hot dish.

HAMS OF WESTPHALIA

Processes by Which They Are Cured and Flavored.

The famous Westphalian hams, which are eaten without cooking, are cured by an elaborate process that has been worked out patiently and skillfully by generations of expert workmen. A writer in the New York Sun thus describes the process:

After being rubbed thoroughly with a solution in which there are 100 pounds of salt to one pound of saltpeter, the hams are placed on cement floors, or in vats, and thickly strewn with salt. They lie under salt for two weeks and then pass to a vat that contains a 22 per cent solution of brine. They remain in that solution for eighteen days. Every day they are shifted in the vat; the hams on the bottom are brought to the top, and vice versa.

At the end of the eighteen days the hams are packed, one upon another, in a cool, dry cellar, where they remain for four weeks, in order to ripen—that is, to take on color and become tender. Then the salt is washed off with a stiff brush dipped in lukewarm water, and the hams are put to soak for twelve hours in fresh water. After that they are ready for the smokehouse.

The smokehouses are two or three stories high, with holes bored in the flooring. The fires are kindled on the ground floor, and the meat is hung on the second and third floors. The fires are made entirely of beech wood, but the workman constantly throw juniper berries and juniper twigs on the embers. The fire burns brightly. It is checked with beech wood sawdust whenever it burns too briskly.

The smoking continues for about eight days. Under the ancient curing methods, however, the hams were often kept in the smoke rooms for six weeks, and it is by this latter method that the best hams are still made by the country folk of Westphalia.

Advice to Girls Who Work

Do you possess a bank account?

If you are the wife of a man of affairs or the daughter of some well paid worker you may answer in the affirmative without a thought as to the desirability of this possession. If, on the other hand, you are one of the thousands of working women who can depend only upon their own brains to bring in their daily portion of bread you may be forced to admit that a bank account has been the object of your dreams for many a year, but that you have never been able to make it a realization, try as hard as you could.

Few business women know how to save money.

"But," perhaps you remonstrate, "how can I put anything away when all my salary goes to pay my way in the world?"

Saving is no doubt difficult when the weekly stipend is small, but even under these circumstances something should be put away if for no other reason than the one of cultivating the saving habit. Hundreds—no, thousands—of women have enough intelligence to make money, and good sums of money, too, but few have enough sense to save even a small portion of their earnings.

And yet a bank account is their only protection against sickness, old age or loss of position—the only means of giving the worker any independence and personal freedom.

The girl who has no bank account is forced to put up with all sorts of inconveniences; she cannot give up employment which is uncongenial, because she has nothing to draw upon while looking for another opening. If she becomes ill she must call upon friends or relatives for aid, and if she is so unfortunate as to be alone in the city she may even be forced to become the object of charity.

With this possibility in view one would think that every feminine worker would realize the importance of saving. But apparently few wage earners do. You find the girl behind the counter spending her nickels and her dimes on candies and the movies just as you find her sister in a higher scale of endeavor throwing away her hard earned dollars on innumerable new hats, blouses and theater tickets. Both have the happy optimism which is characteristic of many women who earn their living. They live in the present, refusing to look into the future.

Begin now to put away something every week. Perhaps it will be only 25 cents if the pay envelope is pitifully small, but 25 cents every week amounts to a fair sum at the end of the year. The point at the beginning is not how much you save, but the fact that you save consistently. After awhile the sum will increase, and, having acquired the saving habit, you will have at your disposal a sum of money that is quite respectable in its proportions.

The greatest drawback to saving is that once a woman has a good position she believes she will go on holding it indefinitely. Unfortunately, prosperity brings optimism with it, and few women who are making more money than usual can persuade themselves that they may ere long make less. Then to the prosperous woman saving is unattractive; its returns look to her to be so insignificant. (We are referring now to the wage earner and not to the woman who can put by at $100 at a time.) For the wage earner saving is saving pure and simple.

Four Interesting Dishes For Luncheon.

Creamed Toast With Cheese Sauce.—This makes an excellent breakfast dish. Make slices of toast from whole wheat bread. Make a white sauce in the proportion of two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour added to one cupful of milk. To each cupful of milk add one-half cupful of grated cheese. As soon as this is melted pour over the toast and serve. Two or three dates, pitted and shredded, may be added to this dish.

Creamed Chicken.—Breast and thighs were served for Sunday's dinner; the rest is picked and put in cream sauce and served around riced potatoes. To one cupful of cream sauce add two tablespoonfuls of finely chopped pepper. One quart of potatoes are washed, pared, boiled and put through the ricer or fruit press on to center of hot plate, the creamed chicken around the edge. Sprinkle the potatoes with cut parsley and dust with paprika. The chicken can be served on toast and the potatoes separate.

Covered Eggs.—Make a paste with one cupful of fine white breadcrumbs, one beaten egg, two tablespoonfuls of minced ham or other cold meats and enough milk to moisten. Line buttered cups with this mixture and drop an egg from its shell into the center. Bake or steam until the eggs are firm. All the better if the yolk is hard. Loosen from the cup and turn each out on a small square of buttered toast. This quantity is sufficient for four to six eggs.

Hot Cheese Sandwiches.—One roll snappy cheese, one egg well beaten, one tablespoonful Worcestershire sauce, one-fourth teaspoonful salt, one-fourth teaspoonful mustard, bacon, rounds of bread. Cream the cheese, add the egg and seasoning and spread on the bread, which should be cut about a half inch thick. Place a slice of bacon on each round and bake a few minutes in a quick oven till the bacon is done. Serve with a green salad.

TODAY'S FASHION NOTE.

To wear the new collars effectively one must have the appearance of escaping strangulation with the utmost grace and good humor. Despite their quaintness, however, the latest neck trimmings have the merit of comfort and will surely protect the neck and throat from chilling blasts. The coat, of which thefur collar, band and cuffs are features, is developed in black zebeline. It has a fitted waist and full flare skirt which require to make, 4 1-2 yards 54-inch material.

Pictorial Review Coat No. 6377. Sizes, 32 to 46 in. bust and 16 to 20 years. Price, 15 cents.

RESCUE PATIENT IN CHIMNEY.

Sick Man Saved After Desperate Struggle by Hospital Attendants.

Philadelphia.—Wedged halfway down the chimney of the four story building used as a men's medical ward, Benedict Strun, a patient in the Philadelphia hospital, narrowly escaped suffocation while hospital attendants labored desperately to extricate him from the perilous position.

What prompted Strun to get in the chimney is a mystery to the hospital physicians unless his mind became temporarily unbalanced and he attempted to escape. Strun went on the roof of the medical ward unobserved and climbed into the chimney. Soon afterward other patients in the ward reported to the attendants that they heard cries coming from the roof.

Armed with picks, some of the attendants began to open the chimney close to where the imprisoned man was suspended, while others hurried to the roof and attempted to reach him by stretching a rope down the mouth of the flue. Just at the time when the workers below had almost succeeded in making an opening into the chimney those on the roof managed to get a rope to Strun.

He succeeded in getting both arms free and after he had got a good grasp on the rope was hauled to the top.

AMERICANS IN CANADIAN ARMY

Two Thousand Serving, Says General Hughes—More Than 100 Slain.

London.—There are no fewer than 2,000 Americans in the ranks of the Canadian military contingent, said Major General Sam Hughes, Canadian minister of militia, at a meeting of Americans held here.

"I have already written letters of gratitude and sympathy," said General Hughes, "to mothers of more than 100 American boys who have fallen while fighting in Flanders alongside Canadian comrades. More than 2,000 enlisted, and we could have many more if we wished. Any number of West Pointers offered their services as officers, and some are now with us."

HOARDING WEALTH.

Could I climb to the highest place in Athens I would lift my voice and proclaim: Fellow citizens, why do ye turn and scrape every stone to gather wealth and take so little care of your children, to whom one day you must relinquish it all?—Socrates.

Miss Eugenie Besserer Arrived in New York City With Just 25 Cents—Now a Star in Pictures

Miss Eugenie Besserer, the French emotional actress, had a long experience in the spoken drama before she became a star in motion pictures. She has appeared in the support of Nance O'Neil, Wilton Lackaye and Frank Keenan. Miss Besserer is perhaps the most versatile of motion picture stars, and her appearance in the leading role in Selig Diamond Specials "The Smoldering" and "The Melody of Doom," created world-wide attention. In the following article Miss Besserer tells over her own signature her experiences as an actress.—Editorial Note.

By EUGENIE BESSERER.

You may talk all you please about the "dignity of the stage," but do not forget the "dignity of the motion pictures.' Not so long ago it was considered undignified to leave the spoken stage for the silent stage. Those having the temerity to leave the stage for the movies were cause for commiseration. "Miss Jenkins, I see, has gone to the movies, well, well!" Now the shoe is on the other foot. The exclamation may soon be heard: "Miss Jenkins, the well-known movie actress, has returned to the stage, well, well!" To paraphrase an old song: "It shows what a difference just a few years make!"

I was born in Paris, but was taken by my parents to Ottawa, Canada, early in life and I spent my girlhood in Canada. Unfortunately I was left an orphan and later, at the age of fifteen years, I escaped from my guardians and found myself an absolute stranger, in the great city of New York, in the Grand Central Station, with 25 cents in Canadian money in my pocket. Through the kindly aid of a street car conductor and a directory, I succeeded in locating a former Governess whose name I happily remembered. This kindly lady was delighted to see me and with her aid, I discovered the residence of an uncle, with whom I took up my abode.

I continued my studies and became quite proficient in athletics. I took lessons in fencing and became rather proficient. I shall always remember that I held my own with no less an accomplished swordsman than the late Alexander Salvini.

I had always an ambition to go on the stage, and my first theatrical experience was with McKee Rankin, when he was starring Nance O'Neil. Following this I played engagements with Wilton Lackaye and Frank Keenan, and then came a season in stock at Pike's Opera House, in Cincinnati. Another season I played in drama opposite Henry J. Kolker.

I became wearied of stage life, with its hardships, traveling and hotel life, and again took up the art of fencing at the Berkley Lyceum in New York City. Alice Roosevelt Longworth was one of my pupils. I then again returned to emotional roles on the stage, was fortunate enough to attract the attention of Margaret Anglin and was taken by her as an understudy to Australia.

When I was eighteen years of age I tried my hand at play writing and wrote a drama which was successfully produced. I am also the author of a number of vaudeville successes, notably a fencing playlet, called "An Accident."

The illness of my sister brought me to California. There I became interested as a professional in the artistic possibilities of the motion pictures and concluded to locate in the Golden State, naturally selecting the Selig Polyscope Company as the most desirable association.

It is not only good looks that count for success in motion picture work, one must have physical endurance, a capacity for the hardest kind of labor, and a willingness to follow the mandates of the Director.' No matter how long an experience one may have had in dramatic work, no matter how versatile the artist may be, the Director's word in motion picture production is law.

I remember one versatile actor in the cast of "The Circular Staircase," released in five acts as a Selig Red Seal Play. This actor has had many years of experience in the spoken drama. He came to the screen with knowledge of his experience and with knowledge of his own importance. He was not inclined to observe the orders of the Director. The Director selects the types, he selects the costumes to be worn, he orders the entrances and the exits, and little is left to the artist. This particular actor could not understand this procedure. He had been acustomed to having his own way on the stage and there was many a tilt before he could appreciate that movie action must be done as the Director orders, for the Director of Motion Picture production is all responsible and all supreme.

I was delighted to be assigned the character lead as "Aunt Ray Innis" in Mary Roberts Rinehart's great mystery story, "The Circular Staircase." I felt that I was fitted to such a part. As you will probably remember, "Aunt Ray" leases a banker's home. She is a woman with the courage of her own convictions, and when warned to remain away from the summer house she is more resolved to remain right there.

"Aunt Ray" and her servant are aroused at 3 a. m. by the sound of a revolver shot. They venture forth, find the men folks have disappeared, and "Aunt Ray" is horrified to discover a lifeless body huddled in the dark shadows at the foot of the circular staircase from which the five-part production takes its name. The action starts right then and there and is never finished until the final scene where the lovers are reunited.

There is a scene in which I am supposed to do battle with a mysterious stranger in a secret room which I have discovered by means of a tape measure. There is nothing suppositious about this conflict, either. "Put the pepper into this fight," ordered the Director. When it was finished the unfortunate actor in the struggle had his shirt partially torn from his back. To all intents and purposes it was a real fight, and the actor had difficulty in escaping my clutches and springing to the circular staircase. Then to top it all off, the unfortunate individual had to plunge headfirst down the staircase to his supposed death, and he certainly earned his money after the day's work was concluded.

I think I have put my very best art into the character of "Aunt Ray Innes" in the Selig Red Seal Play, "The Circular Staircase.' I have always been a great admirer of Mrs. Rinehart's writings, and there is every opportunity to put forth one's best endeavors in this story.

A majority of the artists say that motion picture acting is the hardest kind of work. I never deemed it so. I try to forget myself in my part, throw my entire personality into the roles I create and I love the work.

However, it is an art that cannot be acquired by any "school" other than the school of long experience. Actors of years of experience on the stage are the more successful because they have a foundation upon which to work.

OFFICIAL WASHINGTON SEES POLITICS WORRY PRESIDENT WILSON

Washington, Sept. 16.—Above and beyond all else there is one impression that stands out as a result of a brief survey of the German difficulty from the Washington standpoint, and that is that domestic rather than foreign politics lies at the bottom of the trouble. We are in a dispute with Germany which may end in war because our foreign policy has been dominated by our domestic politics. The trail of the politician runs all through the German incident and has bedevilled it at every turn.

At the outsee of everything we dispatched a violent note to Germany, a note which was only justifiable if it meant that we were ready to fight for international law and neutral rights. We talked to Germany as Mr. Roosevelt talked to Morocco in his "Perdicaris alive of Raisuli dead" message. But he sent his note to Morocco, a nation without an army, fleet or power of harm. We sent ours to the victorious German Empire.

It would have been an admirable thing if this "ringing" note had brought German surrender. Then a vigorous foreign policy, a splendid stand for American rights and dignity, would have been an inspiration to every Democratic campaign orator nexty ear. But there never was any notion of what might happen if Germany didn't surrender. We had talked in the spirit of 1776, but when it came to action it was the necessities of 1916 that were considered.

Beset by Politicians

For, once Mr. Wilson had sent his "strict accountability" note, the political horde descended upon him. From every corner of the land the politicians, spurred by the German propagandists, began to flock to Washington. They were in full cry with the Lusitania murder brought the whole question of national honor to a direct issue.

The first point at which the supremacy of the politician is manifest is after the Lusitania assassination. Then Mr. Wilson was told by all the politicians that to get into war was to lose the next Presidential election; to keep the country out was to insure Democratic victory.

This is the clew and the explanation to all the turning, twisting, wabbling that occurred between the Lusitania and the Arabic. This is why there was no vigorous stand, but a succession of notes. The notes were the resort of the administration, which was not prepared to defend the position it had taken by arms and could not abandon it without personal and national humiliation.

The administration continued to talk to Germany bravely, but Mr. Bryan was busy informing Dr. Dumba that the words were for home consumption only. Germany and Austria were apprised thus that there was no intention of making good the words. The Middle Western electorate, the pro-German propagandists, the timorous Democratic politicians, all were assured that there was no intention on the part of the administration to get us into war.

Peace at Any Price

Peace at any price was the cry of the Democratic politicians; peace at any price was the natural thing that Germany expected from the administration. The politicians and the Germans alike believed that the words of the several notes meant nothing, and they had the assurance of the Secretary of State to this effect.

The "strict accountability" note had been intended to coerce Germany and thrill the United States. It was intended as an expression of patriotism, but it was believed to be safe patriotism, because no thought of German hostile action existed save among a small minority of the administration.

The message did not frighten Germany. It may have thrilled the East, but it gave the Middle West and the pro-Germans the signal for action which put the Democratic politicians in a panic and resulted in all the hesitation, indecision, lack of determination which mark the course of the administration from the Lusitania to the Arabic.

National honor had been involved by the first note to Germany, but the administration had thereafter been convinced by the politicians and the press that war would be a fatal political blunder, and its whole effort was concentrated, not in defending national honor, but in finding a way out of the dilemma.

BERNSTORF MUST SHOW HAND IN ARABIC CASE

Washington, Sept. 16.—"Watchful waiting" is the government's program for the next fortnight in its relations with Germany. During that time there will be no direct communication with Berlin, but any exchanges of views that may be necessary will take place informally between Secretary Lansing and Ambassador von Bernstorff.

At the end of two weeks it is expected that one of two things will furnish this government with a plain statement of her submarine policy or Ambassador Gerard will be recalled and the German Ambassador will be sent home.

As already indicated in The Tribune, the German government could satisfy the United States and dispose of the whole controversy by furnishing Ambassador Gerard with a copy of the instructions said to have been given to submarine commanders to destroy no merchant vessels illegally. If the instructions were in fact as they are represented in the informal communications of Count von Bernstorff and in the Arabic note, they would leave no doubt of the sincerity of the German government. Unless, however, Germany decides to do this, or offers similar assurances in some equally acceptable form the good faith of the Berlin Foreign Office will remain under suspicion, which will leave only one alternative—the recall of the American Ambassador.

Persons close to the White House declare that the President is thoroughly out with patience with Germany's unwillingness to talk about the submarine issue in plain, unequivocal terms, and is making his last stand for friendly relations on the terms stated. Newspaper opinions from all parts of the country are said to have impressed the President that the country is tired of being toyed with by Germany and is ready to back the President in decisive action unless Germany comes down to a declaration of principles.

RUSSIANS THREATEN TO OUTFLANK TEUTONIC ALLIES

London, Sept. 16.—Increased offensive by the Russians all along the line except at one or two points is indicated in the official bulletin from Petrograd and the Teutonic capitals.

While Feld Mrshall von Hindenburg, in his drive toward the Dvinsk-Vilna Railway have reached a point west of the bridgehead across from the town of Dvinsk, this movement may be checked by the necessity of reinforcing the Teutonic line to the south, where the Russians are making steady gains.

The cavalry of the Field-Marshal has cut the railway at one or two points, about midway between Dvinsk and Vilna, but even here, despite the great sacrifices being made by the German troops, the progress is slow.

At other sections of the line where the Germans were reported recently to be advancing they have been stopped. In Galicia the sustained attacks of the Russians are said to have thrown the Austro-German armies back across the Dniester. North of the Galician border the Russians are making a desperate fight to resapture the fortress of Dubno, which fell into the hands of the Austrians last week.

Military experts believe this continued offensive of the Russians in the south will be felt along the entire eastern front. There is danger, they say, of the Germans being outflanked unless reinforcements are despatched at once.

Foster Denies "Boss" Holds Lines on Him; No Promises Are Made

Although William J. Hartnett, Democratic committeeman, has repeatedly asserted that Myron F. Foster, the recent designation for Mayor on the Democratic ticket, would be elected by a large majority, and in making this statement, has taken upon himself the responsibility for the nomination of Mr. Foster, friends of the candidate denied yesterday that Mr. Foster had assumed any obligations of any kind or had been compelled to make any promises before Mr. Hartnett named him.

Mr. Foster, it is reported, was indignant when a newspaper article intimated that Mr. Hartnett was directly responsible for his nomination and that he was primarily a Hartnett candidate, and while personally he has made no announcement contradicting the report, his friends are busy denying the rumors of any understanding between the county leader and the Mayoralty nominee.

One of Mr. Foster's staunch supporters related Mr. Foster's side of the affair to a reporter for The Times this morning. According to this gentleman Mr. Hartnett and P. J. O'Brien, who were instrumental in placing the name of M. E. Mead on the party ticket as a candidate for the office, disagreed concerning Mr. Mead's polling strength, and Mr. Hartnett was of the opinion that a stronger candidate should be named. The leader finally won his point, and a committee waited upon Mr. Foster and asked him to take the nomination. Mr. Foster, it is reported, told the committee that he did not want the nomination, but would take it on one condition—that Mr. Hartnett's influence be submerged and that he be allowed to stand alone and follow his own course both before and after the election. The committee made no immediate reply and returned for a conference with Mr. Hartnett.

Mr. Hartnett, it is said, was indignant, and for a time thought of naming another man, but inasmuch as all were agreed that Mr. Foster was the strongest and most popular candidate the party could find willing to run, and realizing the need of a nominee who could make a race with the Republican nominee, Victor C. Lewis, the committee finally returned to Mr. Foster and told him to take the nomination on his own terms.

The report that certain Republican leaders who did not look upon the nomination of Victor C. Lewis with favor and who do not intend to support the party candidate, would work for the election of a Democratic or Prohibition nominee, appears to be well founded, and the same gentleman who related Mr. Foster's version of the conflict regarding his nomination, is authority for the statement that these same Republican leaders had much to do with the naming of Mr. Foster and have pledged him their support.

As the matter now stands, according to the statements of the friends of Mr. Foster and Mr. Lewis, both men are standing on their own feet and neither one asks for nor is willing to receive the support of the Democratic or Republican organizations. Both men are loyal to the principles of their respective parties, but will not brook any domination or interference from the men who have controlled the political activities of the state and county for many years, and neither man, it is reported, has made any promises on the question of appointments.

Both candidates realize that their intentions regarding appointments, particularly for the office of City Attorney, will have great bearing upon their election, and more than one voter has already openly asked each man whether or not certain incumbents will hold office after election. The voters are beginning to realize that the office of the City Attorney carries with it more responsibility and power than that of the Mayor, and the strength of each candidate at the polls will depend, in a great measure, upon his ideas regarding the right man for the city attorneyship.

Several of the local attorneys who have been mentioned as possible candidates for the office have asserted that they would not consider the office at its present salary. One man, reputed to be a tentative choice of Mr. Lewis for the office, said yesterday, "No one has ever mentioned my name in connection with the office, but I would consider the place if they will make the salary commensurate with the labor performed and the responsibility accepted."

CANDIDATE CORRECTS STORY; NO PROMISES MADE OF POSITIONS

James Brooks, nominee for Mayor on the Prohibition and Independent tickets, wishes to deny the statement which appeared in a Syracuse daily last evening to the effect that Mr. Brooks intended the appointment of Thomas Allnutt as chief of police if elected in November. Mr. Allnutt has been a member of the police department for many years and his record is above reproach.

Mr. Brooks, however, wishes it understood that he has made no promises or has not reached a decision as yet on any appointments.

The Prohibition and Independent partisans are quietly working for their candidate and predict that Mr. Brooks' race for the Mayoralty will surprise his opponents.

LONDON PAPER SEES BEHIND NORTHCLIFFE IDEA

London, Sept. 17.—The Daily News this morning asserts the movement for conscription backed by Lord Northcliffe and his newspapers is inspired by a desire to upset the government and precipitate a general election in the hope that "as his Lord Kitchener, Mr. Asquith will be beaten and Lord Kitchener will resign."

How dangerous Lord Northcliffe's policy is to England is evidenced by the statement of W. H. Thomas, labor member for Derby, in the House of Commons, that if the government attempts to enforce conscription three million railway workers in the United Kingdom will strike and that this strike will be supported by other trades, thus precipitating an industrial revolution.

Mr. Thomas' words carried great weight, as since the beginning of the war he has been assisting in preventing strikes and speeding up work on guns, munitions and other war materials.

Mr. Thomas' intimation that the conscription movement is fathered by those who wish to oust the Prime Minister caused a tremendous sensation in the House of Commons, and it is believed he administered an effective, if not a deadly, blow to the conscriptionist conspirators.

LOANS TO ALLIES TO BEAR 5 PER CENT, SAY BANKS

New Yor, Sept. 17.—Here is the status of the Anglo-French loan at the present time:

The total amount wanted is $750,000,000.

The principal loan may be one of only $500,000,000.

The yield to the public will be five per cent, but, of course, the cost to the European governments will be appreciably larger, since all banking commissions will have to be paid by the borrowers.

The bonds, as in the case of all government issues, will not be secured by pledged collateral, but by a first lien, so to speak, on all the assets of the two nations.

The bonds will not all run for the same number of years, as repayment of so huge a sum at one time would be calculated to gravely upset international—that is, foreign—exchange. The first maturity may be five years from the date of issue, one-fifth being paid off annually thereafter, although this proposed arrangement may yet be changed.

Distribution of the greater part of the entire offering has already been arranged, it was stated by inside interests.

Successful negotiations are expected to be carried through, to have such powerful houses as Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and J. & W. Seligman join the flotation, as these interests regard the loan as imperatively necessary for the preservation of prosperity in American business and American agriculture.

The excess bank reserves in the United States today are the largest in history. The national banks alone are carrying about three-quarters of ab llion more cash than required by law, while other institutions, such as state banks and trust companies, are computed to hold as much more.

Money rates are so phenomenally low in consequence of this surfeit of funds that the bankers are anxious to find a safe liquid use for part of their idle holdings. Many institutions could accept billsd rawn against commercial transactions when they could not tie up a large sum in the purchase of five or ten year bonds.

By utilizing these commercial bills, it is pointed out by bankers, the first step toward making this a broad market for acceptances would be taken.

These bills could—and doubtless many of them would—be taken to Federal Reserve banks to be rediscounted, thus giving these institutions their first important slice of business. So far the facilities of the reserve banks have been lying idle for the most part, owing to the abnormal surpluses the banks are carrying.

German Spy Secures Secrets; Claimed to Be British Officer

New York, Sept. 17.—The Army and Navy club of this city, whose membership includes some of the most prominent military men of the United States, has begun investigation last night to determine whether Captain Newenham A. Gray, who has lived at the club as a British army officer for the last eight months, is in fact a German spy.

The club's action was precipitated by charges filed by British agents with the Washington administration.

The British say that Captain Gray's boast of being an officer in the Indian service of Great Britain is disproved by an inspection of the army rolls. Instead of being an Englishman he is a Krupp expert, they assert, who is now obtaining confidential information concerning the manufacture here of arms and ammunition for the allies.

The inquiry instituted by the Army and Navy club is not so much to learn if Captain Gray is revealing to Germany the war secrets of the allies but to ascertain whether he may have used the friendship of the club to discover intimate facts concerning the United States army and navy.

An investigator, whose reports is in the possession of the British Consulate of this city and the United States Secret Service, talked with a reporter concerning Captain Gray as follows:

"Nearly a year ago British agents discovered in New York a Captain Newenham A. Gray, who asserted he had been a British officer in India. He sought the acquaintanceship of American army officers and through the kindness of a member of the Army and Navy club he obtained a room there, and has since made the clubhouse his home.

"By means of the club's hospitality he has been able to meet many high officials in the United States army and navy. He has been their guest on many occasions. For example, he attended the recent tests of howitzers at Fort Totten.

"The British, however, did not become especially interested in Captain Gray until it discovered he had become an ordnance expert for various American concerns who were negotiating with England for war supplies.

"It then became known that he was drawing plans and specifications for rifles, hand grenades and large artillery pieces, and in this way coming into close and intimate contact with the British, French and Italian agents who are buying arms and ammunitions in this country.

"The British government therefore decided to act. The War Office in London was instructed to search the rolls of the British army in India to determine when and where Captain Gray was in service. The reply came back that the rolls contained no such name; nor was there any other record of such a man."

"Another British agent was then called into the case, who poses as a German at the German club. He reported that Captain Gray was known to certain German officials who make the club their headquarters.

"This and other information were then turned over to the Washington authorities, with the result that the United Secret Service men are now working on it."

Members of the Army and Navy club declined to discuss Captain Gray until the club's investigation of its mysterious guest is complete.

One Thousand Women.

The boxing match at Brighton netting $80,000 and attended by 50,000 spectators, 1,000 of whom were women, rather eclipses anying in football excepting the proportion of women attendants. The men included mayors, judges and public officials and the women are described as like unto those seen at the theater or at a concert. It was an orderly throng and nothing occurred which was repellant to any of the 50,000.

Boxing has gone a long way when women may attend bouts and find no offensive feature. The boxing match is our most exciting sport, giving the thrill the Spaniard and his senorita receive at the bull fights. It isn't so brutal as the performance of the matador, but, of course, our women are more sensitive and a good upper cut gives them all the thrill they need. Boxing promoters have shown a desire to make woman man's equal if she has the price. Things are happening in this country.—Watertown Standard.

A Reorganized Elections Bureau.

Addressing the Honest Ballot Association, Frederick L. Marshall, State Superintendent of Elections, predicts that in November the "floaters' vote" here will be "a theory rather than a condition." He declares that he has thoroughly reorganized the office force, has "fine-combed the Bureau of Vital Statistics," so tombstones can't be voted, and is certain the election will be honest. He promises to co-operate earnestly and completely with the association and the police and the District Attorney in work to prevent election frauds.

This is a most gratifying prediction and heartening promise. It is not so many months ago that the Superintends of Elections—there were three of them then—were at swords' points with the Honest Ballot Association or anybody else who undertook to question the adequacy of their work aganst election crooks. Charges of improper political activity were hanging over the incumbents, and the atmosphere of the office was almost one of excuse for, rather than condemnation of, election trickery.

The change is not due to the charges preferred—Governor Glynn never acted on them—but to a Republican administration at Albany. If the coming election does show the floater vote greatly minimized, no small credit will be due to the party which took out of the hands of Tammany the Elections Bureaus, made by "Murphy's boys" into one of the hughest pieces of spoils in the entire state.—N. Y. Tribune.

BABIES DIE AFTER ICE CREAM TREAT

New York, Sept. 17.—Tainted ice cream is believed to have caused the deaths of Theresa Morrissey, three years old, and her brother, Herbert, a year younger, in their home, at No. 58 George st., Ridgewood, Queens.

Lawrence Morrissey, father of six children, purchased a quart of ice cream in a neighboring store, just before bedtime Tuesday and all except one partook of it. That little fellow did not get his share because he had been naughty. This fact may have saved his life.

COME, LET US LAUGH!

The City of Fulton was until a very few hours ago about to cast off its old clothes and don for the first time a new suit of the first magnitude. But those who had cast the die, or who had taken the measure for the suit, have been jolted and the blow delivered has had in some quarters a somewhat soporific effect, and some of us feel like doing anything but laughing.

It is indeed a bitter dose to swallow, not to have the pleasure of showing what kind of stuff the new suit was to be made of, but what is the use of feeling sick, so let's laugh it off.

Why don't we laugh, instead of sitting around so sour and glum? We cannot have it all our own way. And sunshine every day. When the time comes again to get in a blow; When trouble comes, Let us say, Why don't you laugh?

Say, you who wanted to have Commission Government, Why don't you laugh? Don't let your spirits wilt; Don't sit and cry because the milk you have spilt is spilt; You cannot mend it now; But if you would mend it, Ask your neighbor how, or let us tell you how—Just milk another cow. Why don't you laugh?

Oh you taxpayer Committeeman, why don't you laugh and make us all laugh, too, and keep the rest of us all from getting blue? A laugh will always win; Don't you know,———, ———, a laugh will always win? But if you can't laugh, just grin; Come on, let's all join in.

Why don't you laugh?

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS

President American Society for Thrift

Many persons living in cities, who have become adherents to thrift, found during the summer just closed that not only were their family expenses reduced when the back yard was planted in vegetables, but that the family income was added to in another way—selling vegetables to those who had no back yards, or having them, had not the time or inclination to garden.

As an instance of what can be done in just a common back yard, the case of a foundry foreman, one James Young, of an Ohio city, may be cited. Tomatoes were his chief item—24,000 plants. He used hot beds and common sense. He raised besides, sweet peas, grapes, beans and other vegetables. He also raised puppies and chickens. He made over $300 out of his venture last summer, added a few years to his life, and besides got lots of fun out of it all.

Men like this foundry man are not usually failures. They provide for the day when age, or business depression might leave them with no visible means of support. They find that the hour each morning spent in the garden, or in the evening in learning the rudiments of thrift, adds a sense of security that sustains them through the laborious working hours.

Thomas A. Edison in discussing "Failures" said: "Failure is a matter of self-conceit. Men don't work hard because, in their self-conceit, they think they are so clever that they'll succeed without working hard.

"Most men believe that they'll wake up some day and find themselves rich or famous—and, eventually, they 'wake up.'"

These "Failures" who never learned in youth the value of thrifty habits are in the vanguard of the increasing host of dependents in the country, which now numbers in its pitiful list, 97 per cent. of the men and women over 65 years of age who are totally dependent on relatives, the state or county, for their food, their clothing and shelter.

Why not begin today to encourage your children to make gardens in the yards if you live in the city, or give them a piece of land to cultivate if you live in the country? Plan it now for next summer. It will be a delightful anticipation for them during the long winter months. Let them understand that they are to have the proceeds. Impress upon them the desirability of saving the money thus acquired to be used toward their future education—a course in music, engineering, medicine, law, farming, forestry—or whatever appeals to them. It will be a stimulus and thus the seeds of thrift will be sown in your children where they are likely to take firm root.

Dr. Claxton, superintendent of the national bureau of education at Washington, has estimated that the labor of the children of this country which could be directed to the cultivation of school gardens, back yards and vacant lots, might add $200,000,000 to the national wealth each year.

SELF-INTEREST

A certain corporation in Pennsylvania that has a pay roll of $300,000 per month, made up largely of foreign born help, proves conclusively that 20 per cent of the wages of the men go for drink.

Out of 106 recent cases before the local court in the town where this enterprise is located, 89 were traced directly to the results of booze.

This company shows that 85 per cent. of the accidents in their mills, in their plants, can be laid to the door of drink. On Saturday nights, the keg is rolled into the home, and the whole family demoralized. On Monday morning, many of the men are physically and mentally unfit to resume their responsibility.

Absolute prohibition won't work. Reasonable restrictions will—to some extent. Education is the harvest that we reap later. What we want is help now, not after the funeral.

Why not give every man, every conscientious, hardworking, industrious individual, extra pay for sobriety?

We offer rewards for greater results, more money for more work. If sobriety is such a factor in success, why not encourage it?

There are plenty of big men who seem to drink "successfully," but these men are never known to urge their sons to try it.

There are plenty of poor working men who are crowded into the corner through lack of education, loss of early advantages, too tired to think, and these men cannot drink "successfully." You can only lead this class—you cannot drive them. And the best way to lead an untrained mind, is to lead it by the halter of self-interest.—The Silent Partner.

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS.

In Waycross, Georgia, on the second Saturday in October the voters will accept or reject a city charter which includes votes for women.

* * *

In Equal Suffrage Kansas, the jury panel for the September term of the District Court of Wyandotte county, is said to be the first to include the names of women.

* * *

A recent poll in the state of Michigan revealed the fact that eleven out of the thirteen Congressmen were suffragists.

* * *

Without debate or dissent on September 4 the Kentucky Methodist Episcopal Conference in session at Covington placed itself back of the woman suffrage movement.

* * *

According to the New York World, so many women soldiers were found amoung the wounded in the retreat of the Russian army that a hospital in Petrograd had to be set apart for them. Many of them have been made officers and decorated with the Cross of St. George for conspicuous bravery in the field.

* * *

"I have been in the states where women vote," writes ex-President Taft in a recent article in the Saturday evening Post against woman suffrage, "have met the women and have talked to them from the political platform, and I did notd iscover, either from observation or from inquiry, that they had changed their natures in any way or that the homes in those states were any less useful units and centers of happiness than in states where women do not vote."

* * *

The exclusively manhood State of Florida would not force education upon unwilling communities. Oh no, it believes in personal freedom—even of illiteracy. So it passes a local option compulsory education law, thus putting education and liquer selling on the same basis—as blessings to be chosen but not thrust upon a locality.

* * *

This is the season when the pages of the up-state papers are filled with pictures of candidates seeking favor at the September primaries.

As one notes how handsome they are, one and all, the inference is made that they regard their "good looks," as an election asset. But the women can't vote, and it is against women that the indictment is brought that they would vote for the handsomest man.

The conclusion admits of no demur; the taste for beauty in a candidate is not a sex distinction.

MERE PROTESTS AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

In Lincoln't address at Gettysburg, we find as all school children are taught, that our government was a government "of the people, by the people and for the people;" therefore, we might recognize our women as people or what—slaves? unable to do for themselves or transact any business on their own initiative. I think not in most cases, butu nder the present era, if I understand the question, they have about the same right as imbeciles or fools. Now, then, let us as a body politic take it home to ourselves and ask ourselves the question, What would we do if some one should call our wives, sisters or mothers slaves, fools, or idiots? I think the man who would not resent such an insult to his mother, sister or wife is a very poor specimen of an American, to say the least.

If as the "antis" say, that woman's place is in the home and that they are represented by the fathers and sons in matters politic and taken care of by us men, then why is it that so many girls who are working in factories at a wage that it is impossible to get enough to eat and dress so as not to be made fun of when they appear in public—is it any wonder that so many of our girls go wrong? I think not. Where then is the boasted care we have taken of them as voters of this great commonwealth?

The "antis" also "kick" because the slang about mothers leaving the children at home and going to the polls to vote, but say nothing about leaving them with the nurse maid while she takes her pet poodle "Flossie" out for an airing when the "dear creature" is recovering from the effects of an epidemic or of buying the finest cuts of beefsteak for "doggie," and trusting the nurse to see that baby gets pure food and is well cared for at home. Now, taking all of the above points into consideration, it would be well for us to wake up and give the women a chance to right the wrons that we the caretakers of them have failed to do, as we must admit we have done if we are honest with ourselves.

Will write fore of this anon.

A SUFFRAGIST.

MUTT AND JEFF'S NEW FROLIC

"A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men," and women too. The old adage is proven over and over again by the continued and most extraordinary success of Gus Hill's production of Mutt and Jeff. Millions of the best people in America have laughed at Gus Hill's company presenting Mutt and Jeff in their various plays and will continue to laugh at them as long as Bud Fisher and Gus Hill can keep the pace up. Mutt and Jeff in College will not only live up to the past records of phenomenal business, but will prove to be the crowning triumph of Mr. Hill's long business career. Mutt and Jeff in College will come to The Quirk, Fulton, N. Y., next Wednesday, matinee and night. It was designed for laughing purposes only. There isn't a serious thought or a suggestion in the entire show. It's mission on earth is simply to banish a dull care and stifle the hook worm and grouch. Get seats early, as Mutt and Jeff in College invariably plays to capacity houses, and the early bird catches the best seat. Adv.

UNIONISM THE WORKERS' HOPE

Labor Forward Movement Pushing Steadily Ahead.

AN IRRESISTIBLE FORCE.

When Working People Realize Their Power and Make It Effective by Organization They Will Have Gone Far on the Way Toward a Higher and Better Civilization.

By SAMUEL GOMPERS.

The working people have within their hands an irresistible force. Let them learn to use that force for their own welfare and the benefits that will come to human life are beyond conception. That force is their power to produce. Without the working people all civilization would come to a standstill. There is only one way by which the workers can make that force effective—organized intelligent control over their power to produce.

Organization is the one way by which they can enter into greater freedom and widest opportunities to live and to advance from one ideal to another still higher and better.

Application of this truth is the reason for all efforts to spread the gospel of unionism among those still unorganized and to strengthen existing organizations by increasing numbers and by stimulating and reviving the idealism that gives unionism life, purpose and effectiveness. This is the purpose of the many labor forward movements that are now being conducted in many industrial communities. Reports of organizers tell of the success that is attending some of these efforts.

Meriden, Conn., is about to start a movement that will be in commemoration of the New England labor movement and will inaugurate efforts for new growth and new progress. Organized labor of Arkansas intends to devote the week beginning with Labor day to a state wide campaign for organization.

One of the most important campaigns for increasing organization is that recently inaugurated by the United Mine Workers of America among the anthracite coal workers of Pennsylvania. The contract of the mine workers will expire April 1, 1916, and it is the purpose of the United Mine Workers of America to secure a 100 per cent organization among the anthracite coal miners in order that they may be in a position to demand and to secure better terms for their contract and also to secure recognition of the union.

The campaign will extend over a period of sixty days. Wherever meetings are held the miners are showing intense interest in this campaign. The mines are closed down on days when meetings are held, and membership committees of the local unions make a house to house canvass in order to secure new members. All interests seem to recognize the fact that the success of this campaign will determine in a large measure whether or not there will arise the necessity for a suspension of work when the new miners' contract is under consideration for 1916.

Results of these labor forward movements are incalculable. The movement begun in Philadelphia over a year ago is still in progress with the unalterable purpose of organizing all the workers in the city.

These special efforts for organization are necessary to sustain the spirit of organization and to quicken the sense of responsibility and duty that inspires men and women to the best that is in them. They are necessary to keep before people the meaning of the duties of daily life, lest petty details shut them off from the vision of big realities.

Success is always attended with great danger. There is danger of underestimating opposition, danger of forgetting the sleepless vigilance and the constant exertion that lead to success, danger of contentment that hides the pathways to larger growth and greater attainments.

As the trade union movement of America has won victory after victory and has passed beyond that period when the world's treatment of its members created and stimulated a spirit of inspiration and idealism, it has now reached that period when enthusiasm and ideals are not inspired by opposition and persecution, but must be the result of conviction based upon understanding and visions of future possibilities.

The revolutionary fire and energy of the pioneers of the labor movement must be followed by practical idealism that is born of human needs and that manifests constructive result by building up the agencies of human welfare.

The success of each labor forward movement is conditioned by the spirit and the understanding of the individual members of organized labor. With them lies the decision whether these movements shall be regenerating forces in the lives of fellow workers. Indeed, each union member must constitute in himself a labor forward movement, necessary to great progress.

Workers Get Legacy.

Ninety-six employees of the wholesale drug firm of Lehn & Fink of New York will share in $50,000 bequeathed to them by Albert Plaut, a member of the firm. The employees who share have been in the firm's service more than ten years.

Many Species of Banana.

The banana as a substitute for the potato would have one drawback. It has been found that those who live mainly upon this article of diet soon tend to become what is politely called "tubby." The banana with which we are all familiar is only one of many useful species. Cochin China produces a single fruit that is an ample meal for three men, and in East Africa an intoxicating drink is made from the native banana.—London Chronicle.

SONG OF THE SHREW.

It Is Pitched So High That Only Sharp Ears Can Hear It.

The high pitched squeaking or whistling of the shrew is a curious sound and frequently acquires quite a song-like character. More often, however, the voice of the shrew is raised in anger, for it is a pugnacious little animal, and the males have fierce combats in the spring of the year. It is a curious fact that many people are unable to hear the shrew's squeaking, not that the sound is not loud enough, but because it is so highly pitched that only sharp ears can record the vibrations.

Though often spoken of as a mouse, the shrew is of an entirely different species, being insectivorous and having sharp teeth on each side of the mouth instead of front teeth, suitable for gnawing, such as are possessed by mice and other rodents.

Though it exists in very great numbers and can very frequently be observed, much remains to be discovered regarding the life of this little creature, an Italian species of which is our smallest known mammal. It is still a mystery why so many dead shrews should be found about the roadsides and pathways. They are fearless little animals, and even when disturbed in their spring journeys from one place to another they do not allow themselves to be put out of their course by a trifle.—London Spectator.

Nothing but the harmony of friendship soothes our sorrows. Without its sympathy there is no happiness on earth.—Mozart.

SIX MEALS A DAY.

This Husky Old Laborer Had a Fairly Healthy Appetite.

Undoubtedly it is better as a general rule to take food sparingly than to eat to repletion, and there are some people who even advocate living on one meal a day and who practice what they preach. But there was no "one meal a day" nonsense about the aged Sussex laborer whom E. V. Lucas met. Thus he described his daily round and common task:

"Out in the morning at 4 o'clock, mouthful of bread and cheese and pint of ale; then off to the harvest field, ripping and moen (reaping and mowing) till 8; then morning breakfast and small beer—a piece of fat pork as thick as your hat is wide; then work till 10 o'clock; then a mouthful of bread and cheese and a pint of strong beer (forenooner—'farnooner's lunch,' we call it); work till 12; then at dinner in the farmhouse, sometimes a leg of mutton, sometimes a piece of ham and plum pudding; then work till 5; then a nunch and a quart of ale (nunch was cheese, 'twas skimmed cheese, though); then work till sunset; then home and have supper and a pint of ale."—London Chronicle.

Those Dear Girls.

Alice (just engaged)—What do you think Jack said to me last night? That if he had to choose either me or $10,000 he wouldn't look at the money. Marie—Dear, loyal fellow! Wouldn't like to risk the temptation, I suppose.—Boston Transcript.

CHOPSTICKS IN JAPAN.

How They Are Used and How They Are Served In Public Places.

The use of chopsticks is general in Japan, except among the richer classes, who have adopted European knives and forks, and, to some extent, the European cuisine. Small bowls of china or lacquered wood are the usual table equipment. After the various solid portions of the food have been lifted to the mouth with chopsticks the liquid remaining is sipped from the bowl.

In the case of rice, which would be tedious to pick up grain by grain, the bowl is often raised to the mouth and the rice shoveled or pushed in with the chopsticks. It is also customary to pour a little tea into the rice bowl after it has been nearly emptied, and in this way the few remaining grains of rice are washed down as the tea is drunk.

At public places the chopsticks at each meal must be new. This is indicated by the fact that the chopsticks are made from one piece of wood and are left joined together, as were matches at one time in the United States. These new chopsticks are incased in a thin paper envelope, sealed at the end, and bearing Japanese characters advertising either the hotel or some firm that has furnished them free to the proprietor for the sake of the publicity thus gained. Toothpicks, which are freely used by all Japanese at meals, are also inclosed in envelopes that frequently bear advertising matter.—New York Times.

EXPLOSIVES OF WARFARE.

To a Great Extent They Are a Development of Fireworks.

War is a wholesale fireworks celebration. A giant firecracker is really a dangerous bomb, and rifle grenades are but small rockets, carrying high explosives and fired from rifles. Great fort destroying projectiles look simply like gigantic rockets.

The first magazine gun was a Roman candle. The first projectile propelled by an explosive was a rocket. The first shrapnel was a bomb discharging luminous stars instead of bullets.

Modern warfare is, so to speak, a development of Fourth of July ideas.

However, gunpowder—the first explosive—was itself mere play stuff for at least a thousand years before anybody thought of using it for war purposes. It was commonly employed in China for fireworks and crackers during the earliest centuries of the Christian era. The bombs nowadays dropped by military aviators are children's torpedoes magnified to make them deadly.

Really an incendiary bomb was the famous "Greek fire" of the crusaders.

It has been said that shrapnel is a modified fireworks bomb. It has the form of a cylinder, which, at a distance from the gun muzzle suitably timed by a fuse, blows its own head off, throwing out 250 or more lead bullets that travel on their own account with a velocity of 400 feet a second.—Philadelphia Record.

Cemeteries Where Women Gossip.

Friday, the Sabbath of the Moslems, when all true believers of the masculine gender make a point of going to church, their wives, sisters and daughters resort to the cemeteries and wail for the dead. But all their time is not spent in weeping, and sorrow is not the only emotion they display on these occasions. They take with them bunches and garlands of flowers, and decorate the graves of their relatives and pray and weep over the dead for a time. Then when this pious duty is performed they gather in little groups and have a good time gossiping about the living. Thus the day of mourning is very popular among the Moslem women. It gives them almost the only opportunity they have of cultivating the acquaintance of their neighbors.

Crowns by Wholesale.

It is told of one of the ancient kings of Egypt that his coronation procession occupied a whole day in passing through the city of Alexandria and that 3,200 crowns of gold were carried by the servants. One crown was three feet in height and twenty-four feet in circumference. There were also carried in the procession sixty-four suits of golden armor, two boots of gold, four and a half feet in length; twelve golden basins, ten large vases of perfumes for the baths, twelve ewers, fifty dishes and a large number of tables—all of gold. Twenty-three of the 3,200 crowns were valued at £834,400, and it is not surprising that the procession was guarded by 80,000 soldiers.—St. James' Gazette.

WORKED ALL NIGHT TO SAVE COFFERDAM

A gang of men worked all night last night on the cofferdam at the Bradley contract at the upper bridge in an attempt to save the structure from collapse. Yesterday a steel shovel was run under the dam and the coffer was strengthened with huge piles of rock ballast. Although the water was within six inches of the top of the dam before midnight last night, the contractors were of the opinion that the dam would hold, provided no heavy rainfall came today.

WOMAN AND HER 40 CATS DEFY CITY

New York, Sept. 17.—Despite the protests of many neighbors and the efforts of the Health Department, the Police Department and the Tenement House Department, Mrs. A. T. Davis and forty cats, or it may be more, were holding the fort valiantly in her apartment at No. 1071 Franklin avenue, the Bronx, last night.

Two protesting tenants moved out yesterday, and John T. Dunn, agent for the landlord, said he was trying to regain possession of the apartment occupied by Mrs. Davis, but had not succeeded.

Mrs. Davis, who is under forty years of age and quite good looking, rented the apartment on August 1, saying she had no family, lived alone and enjoyed a rather comfortable monthly remittance from a wealthy father. She was considered a desirable tenant.

The neighbors, however, observed that her baggage consisted mostly of hat boxes. She carried them in two at a time and did not trust them to the furniture moving men. That night the other residents of the neighborhood discovered that the hat boxes contained cats of all varieties. The concert began early and continued until daylight.

MERCERSBURG STUDENTS WITNESSED FIRST FIASCO

Letters received yesterday from Francis Murphy and O. Courier, who are entered at Mercersburg, say that they were in attendance at the Packey McFarland-Gibbons bout last Saturday at Brighton Beach. Thirty thousand fight fans from all over the country attended the match, and, as is well known, the affair was hardly worth while going across the street to see.

The two local boys were as much disappointed as the rest of the crowd, they write, but they at least saw the $32,500 babies caper through ten of the rounds. To use their own language, Packey aimed a slap with an open glove at Gibbons and the pride of the Middle West ran as fast as he could away from the kittenish blows. When Gibbons did stand up and swing his blows came at least two feet from landing.

Murphy and Courier will continue visiting some of the larger cities in the East and will go Monday to Mercersburg. Both boys will engage in athletics, Murphy being already a regular member of the football squad.

AT 97 HE SMOKES UNDER SURGEON'S KNIFE

Camden, N. J., Sept. 16.—Philip Carey, ninety-seven years old, oldest patient ever operated on at Cooper hospital here, cheerfully smoked his corncob pipe today just to show the surgeons who operated on him without the use of an anaesthetic that he was made of stern stuff.

All of the nurses and surgeons wondered at the aged man's vitality, but he only smiled. When they gathered about the operating table and prepared to administer an anaesthetic Mr. Carey waved them aside. "I don't want to smell any of the stuff," he said. "Just go ahead and carve away whatever you thing is necessary. I guess I can stand it."

With only a local application of cocaine, the surgeons then began a delicate operation. The surgeons said the operation was a complete success.

BOY STEALING GRAPES IS SHOT

Bennington, Vt., Sept. 17.—Walter Hollister, sixteen years old, will probably be blind for life as the result of receiving a charge of peas full in the face. Hollister was stealing grapes from the garden of C. P. Oatman, who lives in this village, when the latter discharged a gun loaded with peas at him. The boy was hurried to the Troy hospital in an automobile, where it was discovered that one eye was destroyed and little hope was expressed of saving the other.

ALBERT WHIPPLE WILL BE BURIED TOMORROW

The funeral of Albert Whipple, whose body was found in the race near the Victoria Paper Company yesterday morning, will be held in Jacksonville, N. Y., tomorrow. Coroner Cusack gave a verdict of death by accidental drowning after viewing the remains yesterday and issued a burial permit.

The body was at first thought to be Albert Cassidy of Granby, but Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Keliher of South First st., positively identified it as that of Albert Whipple.

Mr. Whipple left some of his belongings at the Keliher home Monday when he returned to the city after a short trip, and they had not seen him since Monday night.

The dead man was 50 yeasr old and lived at Bowen's Corners. He is survived by four brothers and one sister, all of whom live in this vicinity.

HORSES STILL IN DEMAND

"The United States Department of Agriculture reports that within the past year there have been shipped to Europe for war purposes about 425,000 mules and horses. This situation is bound to have its effect in the horse market of the United States. It may be true to a certain extent that automobiles and farm tractors are taking the place of some horses on the eastern farms, but certainly not to the extent of 425,000 per year. On addition to this, it must be remembered that the purchasing agents of foreign countries have taken only those best suited to their needs and have left us a large proportion of horses not adapted to farm work," writes F. R. Stevens, the agriculturist of the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

"Some weeks ago I met on a train a purchasing agent for one of the European countries who had just purchased and consigned to his country a large number of horses for war purposes. He had been throughout the East and Middle West to find the type which he desired. He made some severe criticisms of the type of the horses which we are producing in this country. He specially criticised, and I think with a great deal of justice, the nondescript stallions which are being kept throughout the farming country of that part of the United States which he saw. He stated, with justice, that they were not true to any particular breed which he knew and were of such a mixed pedigree that even though the individual might be of good appearance and good type, it was almost a certainty he could not breed true to his type.

"The type of stallions may be improving to some extent. In fact, I think that there are more better breeds in the country and that they are more generally used than ten years ago, but the improvement is not eonugh to be greatly encouraging, and the condition which we are confronting now is that the tremendous sale of animals from this country is taking the better type of mares from which we should breed. We can cure this only by the absolute elimination of all stallions not bred long generations to a type and that the one we want. and by substituting for them animals with a known pedigree that will raise the standard of the colts.

"Occasionally we hear the statement that gasoline power is to be substituted almost entirely for horses and that the market and demand for horses will decline. I do not think this situation is as serious as some think. We heard this when automobiles first made their appearance and yet, even before the outbreak of the European war, the price of good horses was higher than before in a great many years. The drain on the United States for war horses has not yet ceased and may not for some time to come. I believe it will repay our farmers to work through their local farmers' organization, if there are such, to bring into each community stallions of the type which will bring us money three or four years from now."

MINETTO CO. GETS BIG REDUCTION

Minetto, Sept. 17.—A reduction of the assessment of the Columbia Mills and Northern New York Power Corporation's property at Minetto from $802,000 to $201,000 has been made by the assessors of Oswego Town, according to the assessment rolls, filed in the office of Town Clerk George W. Phillips at Oswego Center.

The books show that the valuation of the Columbia Mills has been placed at $150,000 and the Northern New York Corporation at $51,000. Last year's assessment on the Columbia Mills property was $176,000. Since the 1914 assessment was made the Columbia company has transferred considerable property to the Northern New York Company on a site for the new power house now nearing completion.

Although the reduction is large it is said that the assessment is not entirely satisfactory to the company. It is unlikely, however, that there will be any litigation.

The assessment was first fixed at $802,000 for both companies, it being alleged that the new power company would make a big earning on the sale of power and should, therefore, be assessed at a high figure. The companies opposed the assessment at a hearing on grievance day and the assessors suggested as a compromise that a reduction be made to $450,000 This was not acceptable to the companies, and F. E. Cullen, their attorney, stated that he would sue for a writ of certiorari to review the assessment of all the property in Oswego Town if the assessment should be made at that figure. Mr. Cullen contended that the assessment was grossly unfair, considered in comparison with the valuation of other property in the town.

Udelle Bartlett was engaged as the counsel to the protesting companies and aided Mr. Cullen in preparing the case. A conference was held Monday last, in which the assessors, County Attorney Gallagher, as attorney for the Town of Oswego; Mr. Culkin and Mr. Bartlett took part. As a result of this conference the reduction in assessments was made.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE

News Mostly of a Political Nature From the Nation's Seat of Government for Times' Readers.

Washington, Sept. 17.—(Special Correspondence.)—Secretary Garrison has hitherto been recognized as one of the two strong men in the cabinet. The secretary is in danger of losing this reputation.

Whether the call of the wild Democrats in New Jersey who want Garrison to run for Governor has turned the secretary's head or whether the dire necessities of his chief are the moving cause, may not be stated with positiveness. But the fact remains that, for some reason or other, Mr. Garrison has laid aside the atmosphere of efficient silence in which he has heretofore been doing his work and now bursts into print with absurd and petulant criticism of all who venture to express an opinion contrary to that held by the administration.

His rebuke of Gen. Leonard Wood for Roosevelt's speech at Plattsburg is a case in point. And more recently has come another in a published rejoinder to a letter from the American Defence League in which the league accused the Wilson administration of opposing practical efforts to put the nation in a state of military preparedness. This letter, Secretary Garrison says, "quite obviously was prepared and published to cause me embarrassment." If that is the result of the letter, it is only because the secretary had put himself in a position to be embarrassed by it.

The fact that the administration has set back the program of preparedness for more than a year. The President himself discouraged any discussion of the topic at the last session of Congress, and, at a time when there was pending before the Senate a proposal for the construction of an adequate undersea flotilla, he insisted upon wasting six weeks of the Senate's time in a vain attempt to pass the iniquitous ship-purchase bill.

It is no wonder that the administration is sensitive on this point, and the secretary's letters and interviews contribute largely to the general belief that the accusations of neglect are well founded. The President himself has also joined the lists and has made public the letters which he wrote to the War and Navy Departments last July. In these letters he tells of the quantity of though which he has devoted to the subject of preparedness. But in December last he told Congress that national defence had not been neglected and that the country has been misinformed.

The fact is that he has not departed from the position he took last December and the Democratic leaders in Congress have not departed from it. Senator Kern of Indiana, majority leader in the Upper House, and Mr. Kitchin, of North Carolina. who holds an analagous post in the Lower Branch, have lately come out in opposition to any adequate increase in either the army or the navy. The Democratic flock will largely follow these bell-wethers—and the President will be well content. A brief respite from the tension which has existed with Germany serves to turn the Democratic mind to ship-purchase legislation and to pork barrels. If anything is to be accomplished for national defence next winter it will be by the sturdy advocacy of Republican Senators and Representatives, with the aid of a few Democrats who do not echo the thoughts of "Olympian superiority" which emanate from the White House. At present it is plainly evident that the only kind of defence which interests the administration is the defence of the Democratic party.

How to Write Advertising Copy

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

A SKILLED layer of mosaic works with small fragments of stone—they fit into more places than the larger chunks.

The skilled advertiser works with small words—they fit into more minds than big phrases.

The simpler the language the greater certainty that it will be understood by the least intelligent reader.

The construction engineer plans his roadbed where there is a minimum of grade—he works along the lines of least resistance.

The advertisement which runs into mountainous style is badly surveyed—all minds are not built for high grade thinking.

Advertising must be simple. When it is tricked out with the jewelry and silks of literary expression, it looks as much out of place as a ball dress at the breakfast table!

The buying public is only interested in facts. People read advertisements to find out what you have to sell.

The advertiser who can fire the most facts in the shortest time gets the most returns. Blank cartridges make noise but they do not hit—blank talk, however clever, is only wasted space.

You force your salesmen to keep to solid facts—you don't allow them to sell muslin with quotations from Omar or trousers with excerpts from Marie Corelli. You must not tolerate in your printed selling talk anything that you are not willing to countenance in personal salesmanship.

Cut out clever phrases if they are inserted to the sacrifice of clear explanations—write copy as you talk. Only be more brief. Publicity is costlier than conversation—ranging in price downward from $10 a line; talk is not cheap, but the most expensive commodity in the world.

Sketch in your ad to the stenographer. Then you will be so busy "saying it" that you will not have time to bother about the gewgaws of writing. Afterwards take the typewriten manuscript and cut out every word and every line that can be erased without omitting an important detail. What remains in the end is all that really counted in the beginning.

Cultivate brevity and simplicity. "Savon Français" may look smarter, but more people will understand "French Soap." Sir Isaac Newton's explanation of gravitation covers six pages but the schoolboy's terse and homely "What goes up must come down" clinches the whole thing in six words.

Indefinite talk wastes space. It is not 100% productive. The copy that omits prices sacrifices half its pulling power—it has a tendency to bring lookers instead of buyers. It often creates false impressions. Some people are bound to conceive the idea that the goods are higher priced than in reality—others, by the same token, are just as likely to infer that the prices are lower and go away thinking that you have exaggerated your statements.

The reader must be searched out by the copy. Big space is cheapest because it doesn't waste a single eye. Publicity must be on the offensive. There are far too many advertisers who keep their lights on top of their bushel—the average citizen hasn't time to overturn your bushel.

Small space is expensive. Like a one-flake snowstorm, there is not enough of it to lay.

Space is a comparative matter after all. It is not a case of how much is used but how it is used. The passengers on the limited express may realize that Jones has tacked a twelve-inch shingle on every post and fence for a stretch of five miles, but they are going too fast to make out what the shingles say, yet the two-feet letters of Brown's big bulletin board on top of the hill leap at them before they have a chance to dodge it. And at that it doesn't cost nearly so much as the sum total of Jones' dinky display.

Just so advertisements attractively displayed every day or every week for a year in one newspaper will find the eye of all readers, no matter how rapidly they may be "going" through the advertising pages, and produce more results than a dozen piking pieces of copy scattered through half a dozen papers.

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

Ambrose Peale, press agent, meets Rodney and agrees to go into business with the lad on a salary basis. Rodney has resolved to go into the soap industry and buck the trust.

Rodney, Peale and Mary go into the soap trade together. Rodney then endeavors to borrow $10,000 as capital for his newly formed company.

The offices of the "13 Soap company" are opened, and they advertise it as "the most expensive soap in the world." Peale talks advertising continually.

The 13 Soap company finds its expenses very heavy, and financial rocks loom ahead. Their chief business seems to have been to spend money for advertising under Peale's directions.

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

"No; she's French," said Mary. "She wanted to see your father, and she doesn't speak English. I saw her up at the house."

"Well, let her talk to me," Rodney announced, remembering that he had taken a course in elementary French at Harvard.

"Say, can you speak French?" asked Peale, surprised and impressed by his new partner's accomplishments.

"Not very well, but I can understand it," said Rodney. Then, going over to the countess, he said blankly in English, "Fire ahead."

"Eh?" said the countess.

"Let me see; Oh, yes—parlez," stuttered Rodney.

"Ah, mon Dieu—enfin—vous comprenez Francais?" began the countess delightedly.

"Oui," said Rodney.

"You're immense, kid," put in Peale. The one French word was enough to start up the countess at her best gait.

"Je suis Madame la Comtesse de Beaurien—je desire parler a Monsieur Martin apropos des affaires du savon. Je voudrais obtenir l'agence du savon Martin pour la France," she rattled off in one breath.

"Wait a minute—wait a minute," said Rodney.

"What did she say?" asked Mary.

"She's a speedy spieler, all right," said Peale.

"Would you mind saying that over, and say it slow?" asked Rodney of the countess.

"Eh?" said that lady again.

"Oh, repetez ca s'il vous plait—lentement," stumbled Rodney.

"Je suis Madame la Comtesse de Beaurien—je desire obtenir l'agence du savon Martin pour la France—je peux donner cinquante mille francs pour cette agence."

"Oui," said Rodney, quite pleased with himself, upon which the countess was off again:

"Et enfin—voulez vous arranger cette affaire pour moi? J'ai beaucoup de references. Je suis riche; je suis bien connue a Paris."

"Wait a minute—wait a minute," protested Rodney. Then, turning to Peale, he interrupted plausibly:

"She wants the agency for father's soap for France and is willing to pay 50,000 francs for the concession."

"How much is that in real money?" asked Peale quickly.

"Ten thousand dollars," said Rodney.

"Had I better tell your father?" asked Mary. But Rodney had an inspiration.

"No, no! Why not keep father out of this? We'll sell her the agency for the 13 Soap. That'd be another ten thousand for us. Peale, she's a gift from the gods!"

"Go to it," said Peale, elated.

"But how can you sell her your agency?" objected the prudent Mary.

"I don't know. How can I?" wondered Rodney.

"If only Marie were here to interpret for us!" sighed Mary.

The three partners looked at each other helplessly. They felt as if there were something hovering around that ought not to be allowed to get away, and yet it still eluded them.

"I suppose Marie's the French maid," said Peale. "Doesn't she ever come to the office? It might pay us to send up for her. Get a taxi. Buy one, to get $10,000 back on it."

But as luck would have it Marie herself burst through the door at this moment, shrieking violently at the undersecretary in her native gibberish. She was another gift from heaven, said Rodney. It was the work of a few minutes to introduce the two compatriots and turn them loose on each other. Rodney bundled them into a side room so the rest could hear themselves think, he said. Then he sent Mary and Peale after them, Mary, on second thought, to translate Peale's slang and Marie to put it into French.

Suddenly a door opened, and he started guiltily, but his fears turned to hope when he saw Mr. William Smith coming in. Old Uncle William Smith, one of the oldest friends of the family, had been one of the capital possibilities he had had in mind.

Mr. Smith was not really an uncle, but bore that title only by way of courtesy. Rodney's mother and Mrs. Smith had been at school together, and their children, in the tender years when the real and the pretended are not clear to them in the matter of uncles, had always looked upon their elders as related. Uncle William Smith, when Rodney was a boy, used to make a great show of looking through all his pockets to see if he had a nickel in them for him. Would he find anything now? He would tackle Uncle William for $10,000. Would he fail? Well, he could try.

Peale stuck his head through the door at this moment to catch Rodney's eye and execute a large and on the whole encouraging wink apropos of the

It Was the Work of a Few Minutes to Turn Them Loose on Each Other.

French interview. Rodney gave another wink to Peale that said volumes about Mr. Smith.

"That's all now, Mr. Peale," said Rodney, raising his voice.

"Yes, sir, I understand," said Peale, winking again. "He takes 50,000 shares at par."

"Yes, quite right," said Rodney as Peale's head disappeared.

"Who the deuce is that, Rod?" asked Mr. Smith briskly.

"Oh, one of my staff," said Rodney carelessly.

"One of your what?" asked Mr. Smith, amazed.

"My staff; I've gone into business," said Rodney.

"You've done what?" asked Mr. Smith, laughing uproariously.

"Gone into business. I'm a business man," repeated Rodney.

"That's the funniest thing I've ever heard of," said Mr. Smith.

CHAPTER VII.

The Great Campaign.

"I THOUGHT I'd like to borrow ten—say a few thousand dollars," said Rodney, gulping at Mr. Smith.

"No, sir; not a cent," said Mr. Smith.

"Perhaps five thousand," amended Rodney.

"If it was for a new club or some tomfoolery, in a minute, but to put into your business, it'd be just throwing it away. Why don't you get your father to back you?"

"Father and I don't agree on the value of advertising."

"Oh, that's it, and you expect me to do what your father won't?"

"Well, I thought as a friend of the family," stuttered Rodney.

"You were wrong. Where is your father?" asked the friend of the family.

"In there I guess," said Rodney.

"I want to see him. I guess he'll think this is as funny as I do," Mr. Smith laughed, going out, leaving Rodney sunk dejectedly in a chair.

"Well?" asked Peale coming in again.

"He wouldn't give me a cent," said Rodney.

"He wouldn't? Well, he sounds like your father's oldest friend."

"What about the countess?" Rodney inquired.

"Oh, I got her," said Peale proudly.

"You did? Ten thousand dollars?"

"Fifteen thousand. Pretty good, what?"

"Good? Why, why, I'll have to raise your salary," said Rodney.

"Thanks; I supposed you would," said Peale complacently.

"Where's the money?" asked Rodney.

"We don't get it till next week," explained Peale.

"Oh!" said Rodney dejectedly. "But we must have some more cash to start with."

Peale meanwhile must have left the ladies in some suspense or else they missed his cheery company, for presently Mary came back and said the countess wanted to know how much longer she must wait.

"Coming now," said Peale. "Shall I sign for you?"

"Sure! Sign anything—sign it twice!" said Rodney.

"You know this has got the show business beat a mile," Peale chuckled as he disappeared.

Rodney turned to Mary fondly, wondering if there were not some way in which they could raise some immediate cash. But Mary failed him now for once. She hadn't an idea, she admited sadly. But in the meanwhile Mr. Smith had emerged from the inner office, and something must have come over the spirit of his dreams of good investment, for he greeted Rodney very genially and encouragingly this time. Rodney introduced Mary to him with great pride, catching her back as she turned to go.

"That's all right. You needn't go, Mary. Mr. Smith, this is the future Mrs. Rodney Martin."

"You don't say so!" cried Mr. Smith heartily.

"I suppose you and father had your laugh at me," said Rodney.

"No, I didn't tell him anything," replied Mr. Smith.

"Thanks for that anyhow," said Rodney.

"Of course it sounded funny to me at first," pursued Uncle William, "but when I thought things over after all why shouldn't you be a success in business?"

"What?" said Rodney, hardly able to believe his ears.

"You've been successful in everything else you've tried," said Mr. Smith without a hint of sarcasm.

"Yes, yes, certainly, sure," said Rodney.

"Of course you haven't tried much, but, as you said, I am an old friend, and I figured that if you gave me your word that you'd return the money within a year, perhaps, after all, it would only be the act of an old friend to take a chance. That's what friends are for," explained Mr. Smith. "How much was it you wanted?"

Behind his back the delighted Mary held up the fingers of both hands.

"Ten thousand dollars," said Rodney promptly.

"But didn't you say"— queried Mr. Smith.

"Oh, I'm sure I said $10,000!" Rodney declared. "That's the very least."

"Um! Well, I'll mail you a check tonight," said Mr. Smith.

"I'll never forget it. I tell you, friends do count. Thanks, thanks," said Rodney.

Mr. Smith seemed embarrassed.

"That's all right," he said. "Don't thank me. Good night, Miss Grayson, and I hope you'll be very happy."

Left alone Rodney grabbed Mary by her two hands and danced around excitedly.

"Ten thousand, and he lent it to me! Oh, isn't it great?" he shouted. He kissed her on the strength of it.

"Wait till I tell Peale!" he cried and slammed out.

In the meanwhile the countess came back, her shrill French voice sounding through the door long before she appeared. "Oh, c'est une affaire magnifique! Je vous remercie. Oh, les Americains!" etc., she rattled on as she was bowed out into the hall to the elevator.

"What did she say?" asked Mary of the French maid.

"She said the American men are splendid, but the women are crazy and they can go to the dickens."

Mary recalled at last that she was to report to Mr. Martin herself. She proceeded to the door of his private room and knocked discreetly three times. The old gentleman came in promptly in response to this concerted summons.

"Well, how goes it?" he asked.

"Oh, Mr. Martin, he's perfectly splendid!" said Mary enthusiastically. "So full of energy, hustle and ideas. He's a different man already. You were right—he only needed development."

"Good! Good!" said Mr. Martin. "You're not saying this to flatter an old man's vanity, are you?"

"Indeed I'm not," said Mary.

"Would you rather take a guarantee of $2,500 additional and give up that 10 per cent of his profits?" he asked shrewdly.

"I should say not!" said Mary.

Beautiful Ex-Queen of Portugal Does War Work as Trained Nurse.

AMELIE, PORTUGAL'S EX-QUEEN.

Concealing her identity in cap and stripe for several weeks, Portug'l's ex-queen has been working as a trained nurse in the Third London general hospital at Wandsworth, England.

Entering the hospital as a probationer and insisting that her identity be kept secret, her majesty has been working eight hours a day, performing all the heavy work assigned to other nurses. Every morning she motors to the hospital from Richmond.

For weeks her patients, not recognizing the ex-queen, addressed her as plain "ma'am." Only the sister in charge of her ward knew the secret till recently.

USES FOR OLD LINEN.

How Frenchwomen Use the Tops of Old Evening Gloves.

Never throw away old linen in any shape or form. Cotton sheets and pillowcases when old and worn are soft and splendid for bandages and other sickroom needs. No new bandage ever equals old bed or table linen for such purposes, as they will tell you at any hospital, but it is understood it must be sterilized before being used.

Housekeepers are apt to overlook this use for old linen unless there is really sickness present in the house, but a store of such pieces laid away will never come amiss even if they are only used for ironing boards and for wrapping up bundles in the storeroom, for in a contagious disease old sheets must be hung over the doorways to the sickroom and kept wet with disinfectant. When the weather is hot wet sheets hung about the room will cool the air.

The linen should have been washed clean without starch, and the hands that roll it should be very clean. For an open wound sterilised gauze will be a necessity, but clean linen may be used to protect the bandages underneath. At the hospitals the old linen so utilized is baked in the regular oven to sterilize it before using.

When the bandages are rolled they should be placed in a clean covered receptacle until needed. A glass jar or a covered box will do for the purpose. The width of the bandages depends upon their use. About one inch is wide enough for a finger, and from that the widths vary. For an abdominal bandage six or eight inches may not be too wide.

The tops of old evening gloves have their use too. An appeal recently came from Paris for them, to be sewed together as interlinings in vests for soldiers in winter trenches. Hundreds of poor women are kept employed making these winter comforts.

Nurseries.

In the scheme of living where appearances must be maintained at all costs, where the keeping of servants is regarded as an absolute essential, where the whole aim is to impress one's acquaintances, children are too often regarded as needless luxuries. Where they are permitted to intrude, they come, as a usual thing, in single numbers, one child being considered enough of a burden. In Europe the women who have followed this theory have in many cases seen their entire family swept away and the sad condition has made the mothers of America pause and reflect.

When one comes to think of it, how very few houses are built with nurseries. Even large homes, rented at exorbitant rates, seldom have a nursery. One of the bedrooms has to be given over to the kiddies, but it can never be made to look quite as useful and pretty as if it had been designed for the purpose. The ideal nursery ought to be tiled all round halfway up the wall, not cold green tiles, but a warm shade of tan or a deep pink. The room ought to have fitted cupboards in it, so that not an inch of space is wasted. There should be fitted guards in front of the windows, so that there is no danger of the babies falling out, and the fireplace ought to be large and open, not the absurd little affairs that one finds in the bedrooms of the ordinary modern house.

GILBERT AS A WIZARD.

Curious Tricks of an Old Time Investigator of Electricity.

H. G. Wells has called attention in "The World Set Free" to a half forgotten worthy who, in "the spacious times of great Elizabeth," loomed large indeed. Science, to be sure, does not forget him, and one great English poet, Dryden, has proclaimed with resonant emphasis:

Gilbert shall live until loadstones cease to draw.

Nevertheless how many young students of electricity today ever heard of William Gilbert?

"It was Gilbert, Queen Elizabeth's court physician, who first puzzled his brains with rubbed amber and bits of glass and silk and shellac," says Mr. Wells, "and so began the quickening of the human mind to the existence of this universal presence. And even then the science of electricity remained a mere little group of curious facts for 200 years, connected perhaps with magnetism—a mere guess that—perhaps with the lightning. * * * Except for the lightning conductor, it was 250 years before electricity stepped out of the cabinet of scientific curiosities into the life of the common man."

Gilbert's theories and guesses about magnetism—he concluded that the world is a vast spherical magnet—were serious and farreaching, and he embodied them in a book with a ponderous Latin title—the first great book on physics published in England. But his experiments were chiefly of the curio and plaything sort. An English collection of Elizabethan letters and anecdotes of court life quotes the opinion of a provincial young lady of quality, but recently come up to London to accept a position in the queen's household, who had witnessed some of them. She wrote home to her mother:

"The queen is now well recovered of her sicknesse, which was but litle, tho it lookt at first as it wold be greate. She puts much truste in her Doctor, one Gilbert, and see doe her ladis for the moste parte, and I am laught at by alle but onely Lady Margaret for that I doe fear the man and his cures that they bee not such as are permited to Xtian (Christian) folke to undergoe. I have seen him playe strange tricks, takeing, for the diversion of the queen's ladis, a silke glove from one and her bedes of ambre from another and a scrappe of the writeing of her Love from another, if she have it about her and can be purswaded to give it uppe, and makeing the one to russle and give forthe speckles of fyre, and the others one to pick the other uppe by touching of it—and a blacke catte comeing in he rubed her that she bristled and gave forthe little fyres that danneed alonge her furre in the dark as if the wyches that love blacke cattes were strokeing her back. Seche matters are of the divel and sholde not be medled with for sporte, they are not meet for good Xtians."

Poor, timid little lady! If she deemed Dr. Gilbert's tricks and cures of 300 years ago so perilous to the soul what would she have thought of the electric shocks, baths, massage and all the varied tingling, prickling, crackling and spark spitting electrical devices of our modern physicians?

Before the Toothbrush.

Before the invention of toothbrushes people used to clean their teeth with linen. This is evident from William Vaughan's "Fifteen Directions to Preserve Health," published 1602, in which the author tells those who want to keep the teeth "white and uncorrupt" that they must wash the mouth after every meal, "sleepe with the mouth somewhat open * * * and in the morning take a linnen-cloth and rub the teeth well within and without." In Vaughan's time several varieties of tooth powder were known, the recipe for one of the simplest being as follows: "Burne a piece of Corke till it looks like a Coale, then take it out of the Fyre and it will fall to ashes, wherewith rub your teeth."—London Chronicle.

Fresh Figs.

The first known tree referred to in the Bible is the fig tree. We are apt to think of figs as very sweet, dried fruit, brown in color, packed into long wooden boxes. When newly gathered figs are rather like pears in shape and of a green or purple color. Eaten in this state, the people of the east consider them the most delicious of fruit, but the figs are also dried, and in that form are included in almost every meal.

The Modern Way.

Mrs. Henry Peck—Men have degenerated sadly since the days of chivalry. Sir Walter Raleigh spread his cloak on the ground for the queen to walk on. Women do not walk on men's cloaks in these modern days. Mr. Henry Peck—No; they walk on men's necks now.—Puck.

Open to Conviction.

"I understand," said Mr. Dolan, "that you declared there should be no more fightin'."

"I said that," replied Mr. Rafferty. "But I never was obstinate, an' mebbe a few words of argument from you can make me change my mind."—Washington Star.

A Dilemma.

Wife—Henry, you really must have the landlord come and see for himself the awful damage the rain did to our ceiling. Hub—I can't without letting him see the damage the children have done to the rest of the house.—Boston Transcript.

We are all born for love. It is the principle of existence and its only end.—Disraeli.

LITTLE GIRL'S EMPIRE GOWN.

Girlie's nightie with round neck and short raglan sleeves, shaped at the lower edge and finished with frills of self-material.

The Empire and the kimono effects are pleasingly combined in this little nightie of white nainsook. High-yoked effects are shown in many of the latest gowns, being a pleasing change from the usual straight lines. Cotton crepes are in great demand for underwear, partly because they look well and partly because they launder so easily, requiring no ironing. Hemstitching and frills of self-material are the only trimmings on this model, which only requires 2¾ yards 36-inch material to develop in medium size.

There are so few parts to the pattern that it will be an easy matter to properly place them on the goods. This is, of course, folded so that each section will be cut in duplicate. The front (A) and back (C) are marked by triple "TTT" perforations to indicate that they should be laid on the lengthwise fold of the nainsook. The tiny little piecing that will be required for either side of the front is laid along the selvage edge.

The sleeve, which is short and is shaped to run into the neckline, is laid on a lengthwise thread of the material, between the front and back sections.

For "everyday" gowns there is nothing prettier than crepe, and this material cannot be too highly recommended. Gowns made of crepe have as little trimming as possible to facilitate hand laundering. Featherstitching, picoting or hemstitching in color marks distinction in many simple nightgowns, while net, colored batiste and flowered materials are used for casings, through which a pale-colored ribbon is run.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

DRESS aprons are useful additions to the wardrobe of the woman who does her own housework. These are seen at their best when colored linens are used. The tans, green, blue, old red and brown look well with a narrow band of contrasting color or tiny piping of plain white linen bordering neck and armholes.

The same careful woman protects her hair from dust while busy about the home by wearing a dainty cap made of white mull and lace over a wire frame. This frame is turban shape and is economical inasmuch as the wire frame protects the coiffure from disarrangement.

For the housewife who thinks in advance this is the time to purchase really excellent half silk hose at the surprisingly low figure of 35 cents a pair. An inventive young woman recently purchased a dozen pairs of these hose, which were plain. She then embroidered on them small delicate designs of polka dots, tiny rosebuds and even a pattern of tiny clover blossoms done in French knot with silk of the same shade as the stockings.

If gloves or shoes of any color but black have become spotted by water and are allowed to dry there is no hope for them. They are irreparably ruined. But if, while they are still damp, they are kept on hands or feet and rubbed with a damp cloth the spots will disappear. Then brush briskly with a dry soft woolen cloth.

A young business woman manages a dainty conception in collars and cuffs over her blue serge office frock by a novel use of narrow hemstitched, or embroidered edge handkerchiefs. Two handkerchiefs make a set. One is folded cornerwise and cut in half. These pieces, with the cut edge hemmed, are the cuffs. The second handkerchief is also cut in half and one half hollowed out to fit the neck. The remaining half is again cut in two parts and folded over the bodice in the form of revers. These sets are inexpensive and give an attractive touch to the office dress.

FOR THE BEDROOM.

How to Make the Stranger Within Your Household Comfortable.

The first consideration for a guest is comfort. She may be delighted with the vase of flowers that greets her from a table, but she will be sure to appreciate a pretty negligee hanging in the closet. Luggage seldom arrives at its destination with the traveler, and a negligee to slip into is often a comfort indeed. Feet are apt to be tired, and until slippers arrive the feet would be glad to rest in a pair of simple bedroom slippers. These are really no trouble at all to make. You just take a pair of lamb's wool soles and a strip of ribbon long enough to go around the sole and four inches wide. One edge is sewed to the edge of the sole, and the other is turned down to make a hem through which is run a narrow elastic. This draws the ribbon up, shaping it into a shoe.

Supposing you choose blue ribbon and work a few rosebuds on the toes in embroidery silk and make a simple kimono of pale blue cotton crape trimmed with a frill of white lace and finished with a loose belt of pink ribbon. This would be a dainty outfit and cost but little. Four yards of crape at 15 cents a yard, plain or flowered in blue, with two yards of lace at 10 cents a yard and two yards of ribbon at 12½ cents a yard, will be ample. In fact, if one looked around for bargains $1 would probably cover the entire cost.

Curtains can be made before they are needed, and dainty inexpensive materials can be had in the early spring. The printed lawns in the dress goods section make the prettiest curtains. The scrim and curtain muslins are not desirable. White cotton voile can be used for the sash curtains edged with lace. The colored curtains should be made with a valance, and if made as follows material may be saved: Cut two lengths, each measuring two and one-half yards, and hem one end. Cut a strip the entire width of the goods and twelve inches wide. Hem one raw edge and sew the selvage edges to the top of the two curtains (coming between them) and making one long straight edge. Hem this and pass the rod through, then hang.

The bedspread edged with a frill might be of the same material as the curtains, and slips for cushions could be simple white material over a color or decorated in a color.

How to Use Old Felt Hats.

Instead of throwing away your old or light colored felt hats let them soak overnight in good soapsuds, then wash thoroughly and let dry. You cannot buy finer material for making soft shoes for the baby not yet walking. They are soft, comfortable and can easily be kept clean. When soiled they can be washed on the washboard and molded into shape, letting them stand until dry. The cost is only a little silk thread for trimming.

Anchovies.

The delicious little fish called the anchovy is found in large quantities in the Mediterranean sea and also on the coasts of Spain, Portugal and France, where extensive fishing operations are carried on during the months of May, June and July.

FINANCIAL ECONOMY.

One Man's Scheme When He Found His Capital Was Shrinking.

What one man did when he discovered his capital was shrinking is told in the American Magazine:

"A friend let me into a secret of his financial economy which strikes me as valuable. He is of middle age, with a small family, and has an income of $3,500 a year. He has put by a few thousand dollars. His investments are in gilt edged securities.

"At the end of every six months he figures out exactly the value of his property. Each share of stock, each bond is reckoned at its present market price, and the sale value of his house is placed at the lowest figure. To the current value of his estate he adds his life insurance. The result is the capital which would be available for the support of his wife and children should he suddenly die.

"At the last three reckonings my friend found that his capital was shrinking. There had been declines in certain stocks and bonds and a falling off in the value of his real estate. What did he do? Commiserate himself? Not at all. He went to a life insurance company and took out a policy large enough more than to cover the shrinkage in his capital. Comparatively speaking, it cost him very little, but it added a neat sum to the value of his estate and guaranteed an unimpaired income to his wife."

PENS OF THE PAST.

The Old Time Quill and the Art of Putting a Point on It.

Quill pens are no longer used except in rare old fashioned instances, but people still use "penknives"—you can see the name any day in the cutlery store windows—but they do not use them to make or mend pens. In fact, where is there a man or woman who knows how to put a point on a quill? It was once an art which every man had to master, though women were generally bad at it, as they are now at sharpening pencils.

In the old days the first question asked of a schoolmaster was the one whether he was skillful in pointing quills, for he had to sharpen the pens of his whole school and incidentally instruct his pupils in the art. Alas! There is no modern pen of steel or gold that is so smooth, so swift, so alluring as a good quill pen. The writer is very sure of that, for his father used to tell him so.

The art of handwriting has certainly declined since the quill pen went out of use. The old fellows could really write. We still pay them an unconscious tribute by calling a writer a "quill driver" and picturing the pen whenever we have to make an abstract representation of it, as a quill.—New York Mail.

A Diplomatic Official.

During the reign of Emperor Napoleon III. he and the empress visited Normandy and had arranged to spend a couple of days at Evreux. M. Janvier de la Monte, who was the prefect, learned that the revolutionaries intended to hiss the sovereigns as they passed, and so he summoned the leaders of the movement and told them that he knew of their plot. "If you carry out your plan," said he to them, "you will get six months in prison. If you do not your friends will accuse you of cowardice and treason. As a way out of the difficulty I propose to lock you up at once until the emperor has gone." The conspirators accepted the terms offered them, and so the emperor was greeted only by cheers, as the revolutionaries, frightened at the arrest of their chiefs, had not dared to utter a sound.

The Tail of a Fish.

A fish's tail is its wings. Owing to the machinery of muscle set along its spine and to its cleaving form a trout or salmon can dart through the water at a tremendous pace, though its rapid flights, unlike the bird's, are not long ones. It is soon tired. The water is not so friendly to flight as the air. The stroke of the fish's tail is one of great power, and by means of it and the writhing, snakelike flexion of the body a high speed is reached. The strength behind this speed is shown in the way a fish or sea mammal out of the water will raise its tail and strike the ground or boat.

Victor Hugo.

Victor Hugo was the wealthiest of the nineteenth century authors and also the hardiest. At one time he made less than 1,000 francs last him and his brother for eighteen months, and one chop would serve for lunch three days in succession. But this early abstinence did not spoil Hugo's digestion, for at the age of eighty-three he cracked nuts with his teeth and ate oranges as some folk eat apples—peel and all.

Then the Row Started.

Mrs. Snappem (who has been suffering from toothache)—Thank goodness, I've had that tooth out at last! Mr. Snappem—Happy tooth! Mrs. Snappem—What do you mean? Mr. Snappem—It's out of the reach of your tongue.

The Grind.

"What are you doing now?"

"Two a day," said the vaudeville actor. "And you?"

"I can't quite equal that," responded the popular novelist. "Two a week is about my limit."—Kansas City Journal.

TODAY'S FASHION NOTE

It is in the novel touches that the newest tailored waist show to advantage over the models of previous seasons. Stylish in the extreme is the waist shown here, fashioned of maize colored taffeta trimmed with collar and cuffs of brown and white striped silk. It is worn with a brown gabardine skirt. For the waist 2 1-4 yards of 36-inch material are required, and for the skirt 3 1-2 yards 44-inch gabardine.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

THE TRUSTY BEAN.

LENTIL SOUP.—Lentils, we are told, contain more nutriment than meat. Scientists and vegetarians unite in giving the homely little lentil a very high character as an article of diet. This makes it an excellent basis for a soup maigre, and no meat or stock is really necessary for the following soup:

Fry a large onion (cut in rings) and a large tomato (cut in slices) in dripping. Put a cupful of lentils in a quart of hot water and boil rapidly. Add the fried onion and tomato. To the melted dripping left in the frying pan add a tablespoonful of flour, stir up, add water, boil and then add to the lentil soup. Flavor it well with salt and pepper, boil for one and a half or two hours and press it all through a sieve to make a puree. It goes through the sieve quite easily, and this soup has an additional merit in the fact that it is quite quickly prepared.

Lentil Salad.—An extra nice salad is made by taking one cupful of cooked and chilled lentils, a dessertspoonful of onion juice, six olives chopped fine and one tablespoonful of capers also chopped. Mix together with six tablespoonfuls of mayonnaise and serve on shredded lettuce or with celery cut small.

Bean Porridge.—Take the liquor that corned beef has been boiled in and be sure that it is not too salt. Put a cupful and a half of medium sized beans in liquor and let them boil slowly until soft, but not long enough to lose their shape; then add a pint of hulled corn and boil half an hour. When ready to serve thicken with cornmeal to suit taste.

Lima Beans.—Use a quart of freshly shelled lima beans and parboil them in salted water for twenty minutes. Then place them in fresh, cool water, after draining. Again drain them and put in a saucepan with a lump of butter and nutmeg to taste. Cook for five minutes, tossing well, moisten with cream, add a little chopped parsley, mix well together and serve.

Bureau of Naturalization Tries to Solve Problems.

STATISTICS PROVE AMAZING

During the Eight Years of Federal Supervision 2,500,000 Foreigners Have Asked For Citizenship, and Over Half of These Signify Intention of Attempting to Take Out Their Papers.

Washington.—Nearly 2,500,000 foreigners have asked for citizenship during the first eight and three-quarter years of federal supervision of the naturalization law, according to a statement issued by the bureau of naturalization of the department of labor. Nearly 1,750,000 of these have declared their intention or taken out their first papers. Something over 750,000 have asked for final papers, and of these about 650,000 have been admitted to citizenship. During the same period upward of 85,000 foreigners have been refused permission to citizenship, over one-half of these because of mental and moral unfitness.

While the foregoing figures indicate a large number coming forward for citizenship, says the bureau, the number does not appear relatively very large when it is known that in 1910 there were nearly 14,000,000 foreigners in this country, that of this number 9,000,000 were not citizens and that the foreign body has been increased nearly 1,000,000 annually since then. By far the larger portion of the foreign residents have retained their allegiance to the sovereignty of their birth, and, as it appears, many of these are ready to respond to the call of these sovereignties. Many have gone back who had declared their intention.

ANTHONY CAMINETTI, COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION.

Some of them afterward returned and presented themselves for admission. Judges of the naturalization courts have held that such absence from this country in the armies and fighting under their native allegiance broke the continuity of residence for naturalization purposes and denied their applications.

Among the approximately 14,000,000 foreign alien residents, 1,650,361 are classed as illiterate. These are the natural prey of the designing and scheming foreigners and natives as well at every turn. They compel them to pay tribute, both in cash and blood, for every service, both real and imagined, and in the gratification of their desires, however unscrupulous or unnatural. For years this condition has been studied by the bureau of naturalization in its application to the administration of law. It is safe to say that, although 85,000 foreigners have been refused citizenship because of mental and moral unfitness, at least that many have been admitted in spite of these deficiencies during the period of federal supervision. The courts have been reluctant to refuse citizenship to a candidate even though he be ignorant of our institutions or of the privileges conferred upon him. Especially is this so where there are no facilities offered by the cities and towns where the petitioners live for overcoming these defects. In many places the public schools have, under the inspiration of the bureau, opened their doors to the foreigner and taught him the duties of citizenship, and in these places the courts have refused citizenship unless the candidates could come up to the higher standard brought about by federal supervision. These have been tried with success.

During the last year over 335,000 foreigners declared their intention and petitioned for naturalization. This is the high water mark since federal supervision. The federal census shows that the foreign population is many times greater than the number who come forward for citizenship. In many states the proportion of candidates for citizenship is at the lowest ebb. In no state does it exceed 50 per cent, while in some states it is as low as 2 per cent. This is true of the number of foreigners who take out their first papers and those who become citizens.

BAYONNE HENS MUST LAY OR BE MUZZLED

Bayonne, N. J.—The hens that have roosted adound Bayonne, N. J., for years, pulling a light cackle when in the humor and laying nothing except plans for the future, are to be brought up sharp by the elastic laws of New Jersey. Commissioner Mara, of Bayonne, has evolved an amendment which will make coop indolence a capital crime, and the chicken fanciers of the city are delighted.

An ordinance providing for the life conduct of chickens within the borders of Bayonne led to the amendment for the protection of the sole owners of the feathered idlers. The ordinance called upon chicken owners to obtain licenses if they had coops within the city limits, and provided that all chickens, whether moody or garrulous, be muzzled until ten o'clock in the morning.

Commissioner Mara contends that if the city is able to control overything regarding chickens it should assume the responsibility for their adequate production of eggs and allow rebates when hens, thoroughly equipped for the work, refuse to lay them.

LABOR WILL REVOLT AGAINST CONSCRIPTION

London, Sept. 17.—During the discussion in the House of Commons this afternoon, James Henry Thomas, Laborite and Assistant General Secretary of the Amalmagated Society of Railway Servants, declared every lodge of the Railway Union had informed the Executive Committee that on the introduction of conscription the men would stop work.

"If the conscriptionists want an industrial revolution," he said, "let them proceed with their agitation."

TEST FOODS.

Many Household Staples Found to Be Adulterated.

Housewives ought to have a bit of many kinds of knowledge. The perfect housewife must not only have a thorough knowledge of the cuisine, but she must also be an excellent business woman and know how to apply business methods to her home. She must have a practical acquaintance with chemistry and biology and must have the art of making a house into a home.

Just at present the women in the home need another kind of knowledge which will prove invaluable to them at many a time. That is how to know if their food is adulterated. There are, unfortunately, frauds in every line of work, and the food frauds always seize upon such occasions as the present, when the authorities are busy elsewhere, to perpetrate the worst crimes against the community. Probably foodstuffs all over will be adulterated and the wise housewife will learn how to detect the presence of foreign elements in the provisions she buys.

Butter is one of the first to suffer. Margarine has often been used as a substitute in the past and probably will be passed off many times in the future. While margarine is perfectly wholesome, still no woman wants to pay the price of butter for the less costly margarine. A reliable test is, melt a little bit in a spoon over a gas burner. Good butter froths a great deal, but makes very little noise. Margarine, on the contrary, crackles and bursts and makes little explosive sounds. After applying this test you can refuse to buy again at the same shop if you detect the presence of margarine in the substance which you bought as butter.

The easiest and commonest food to adulterate is milk. Watered milk is almost as common as plain water, but it is so easy to discover the fraud that no housewife need be taken in by it. Pour your milk into a pail or pot. Then take a fairly stout, very bright knitting needle and plunge it into the milk. If, on removal, a large drop of the fluid clings to the end of the needle for quite a time without falling off you may feel quite sure that the milk is all right. If, on the other hand, the liquid runs right off the steel needle and forms no lasting drop the milk has certainly been watered.

Surprised.

Mrs. Bacon—Why, it must be yours, of course, John.

CLUB DENOUNCES NEW CONSTITUTION

New York, Sept. 17.—The proposed new Constitution was denounced as "of, by and for plutocrats" and "as a strengthening of the bosses" at a citizens' meeting at the City Club yesterday.

An organization was formed to try and defeat the instrument at the polls. Register John J. Hopper was made chairman and J. J. Goldstein secretary. Chairman Hopper, in addressing the conference, in which thirty men of all parties participated, said:

"The statement that the proposed Constitution is against bossism is a joke. If the people are to be preferred to the bosses where is the initiative, referendum and recall?

"The proposed measure absolutely prohibits proportional representation and preferential voting—this, with the example before the con- Senators (the full representation) vention of twenty-two Democratic from this city and a Democratic vote of only ofrty-seven per cent.

"As a resident of this city, which pays three-quarters of the state tax, I object to my vote having only two-thirds of the weight of an up-state voter. This city continues to be treated, as it has been, as a conquered province. We protest most emphatically."

Change Must Come By First Holding Special Election; No Other Way

Rumors that several citizens who signed the petition presented to the Common Council August 3, invoking a special election on Plan C of the Commission Government law, were about to institute mandamus proceedings to compel the Common Council to call the election in spite of the fact that the commissioners cannot be elected this year, were current yesterday. While it was rumored that several men had formed a committee which had already placed the case in the hands of local attorneys, no local attorney would admit this morning that he had undertaken any such action.

According to an opinion submitted today by a Fulton attorney such an action is possible, however, and not unlikely. The council, according to law, had no legal right to call off the special election, even though it was petitioned to do so, and the legality of the election of the candidates under the present form of government this fall can be questioned, if those defeated wish it. It is also possible for any signer or signers of the petition filed July 31 to institute mandamus proceedings against the council.

It also appears that many people have the impression that no special election on commission government is necessary now, and that the commissioners can be nominated in 1917 without an election to determine whether or not Plan C shall be adopted.

It is pointed out that an election on any other plan of commission government may be called any time within the next year, but no two elections on the same plan may be called within one year.

The opinion of a local attorney on the subject follows:

Regularity of Designation

In order to determine whether the voters of any city desire commission form of government 10 per cent. must sign a petition and file with the city clerk, asking to have the question submitted at an election. If the petition is filed not less than one month, nor more than three months prior to the general city election, then the Common Council must see that the question is submitted at that general city election following the filing of the petition.

If, however, the petition is filed more than three months prior to the general city election, then the Common Council must, at its next regular meeting following the filing of the petition, fix a day to hold a special election, which day shall not be less than one month, nor more than two months thereafter, except no special election shall be held during July and August.

It follows from the foregoing facts that Fulton must first determine whether it wants commission form of government.

A petition for the submission of this question was duly filed with the Common Council more than three months prior to the coming general city election and on July 31st. It therefore became necessary for the Common Council to designate a day in September for a special election, and it designated September 17th. The council has since passed a resolution declaring this election off. If the election had been held and a majority voted in favor of commission form on that day, no nominations for commissioners could be made until the regular time in the fall of 1917, for the general city election occurring at that time.

In other words, no nominations for commissioners could be made this year after September 17 for our general city election, because September 8th was the last day to file regular party nominations for that election. Our general city election occurs every two years in November.

Delay Means Danger Ahead

It follows from the foregoing that unless we hold a special election some time prior to about the sixth of September, 1917, to determine whether we want commission form of government, we cannot nominate candidates for commissioners at the general city election in 1917; and, therefore, there could be no election for commissioners until 1919.

The statute further provides that if the majority vote against the adoption of a plan proposed, no petition proposeing the same plan can be presented again within one year thereafter.

The action of the Common Council in attempting to annul the special election which was called for September 17th by its own resolution, is illegal and void. The council is given no power by statute to stop an election after it has duly fixed the day and exhausted its power in that respect.

Several citizens, unaware that the Common Council had called off the special election on commission government, visited the polling places in their respective wards yesterday, only to find them uninhabited.

Patriotic Mr. Roberts

The honors for the long-distance wild-goose chase, however, are held by A. Dolan Roberts, who recently sold his interest in the drug firm of Roberts & Wood, and has been visiting in Syracuse for a week. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Roberts suddenly remembered that the commission government question was to be decided on September 17, and hastily cranking his car he left Syracuse for Fulton at breakneck speed. He arrived in this city shortly before 3 o'clock an, after leaving his family at his home, he drove to the Paige Marble works on East Broadway, the polling place of his district. He was amazed when he found no election in progress and only when he came downtown to ascertain the reason for it did he learn that the election had been abandoned. Mr. Roberts was so engrossed in enjoying the vacation that he neglected to read the papers during the past week, and blames that for his useless trip.

WEST SIDE ALDERMAN ALARMED AT THUNDER OF NEW CANDIDATES

In discussing the results of the coming primaries and general election yesterday Alderman William Sullivan of the Second ward, who is running for re-election on the Democratic ticket, denounced the tactics resorted to by some of the new candidates in the field for election to Common Council. According to the alderman some of those running for office have been telling the citizens of his ward that the Common Council was directly to blame for the unnecessary expenditure of $300 of the city's money for the special registration on the commission government election, and that the aldermen were responsible for the expense incurred in printing the ballots for the special election which did not take place.

The alderman wishes to state that such was not the case; that the council had no alternative when petitioned to call a special election and did not know, at the time, that the election would be productive of nothing even if held; that the council acted upon the advice of its counsel in all matters relating to the special election and that none of the aldermen are to blame, either directly or indirectly, for the expenditure of $300 for special registration. While the majority of the citizens are already well informed on these points, the alderman related instances wherein these false statements were credited.

EDUCATION FOR INDUSTRY

(From Current Opinion)

Industry is calling for men who know not only what has been done and who did it, but who can also teach what to do and how to do it. It is reaching out its arms for the sympathy, and help of our educated and successful class, that they may help to teach the laws of industry. Industry! Upon which all the classes depend for their very existence.

All schools should teach that "no one can succeed through education and talent alone—that they are valuable allies, but are dangerous when they usurp the place of solid labor." We must teach that there will always be work to be done, that no amount of education and culture in a nation can reduce the necessity for work; that there must always be just so much work done to support the people of our country; that there is but one way to lessen human labor, and that is by labor-saving machinery and devices—that labor-saving machinery is the cause of our being better paid for our industry than the ancients; that labor-saving machinery and devices are the cause of our better homes, better conveniences and everything we call modern.

There is a great work before the men of education in America. It rests upon them to work out plans by which industrial education may help to raise this country to first place in the world of industry; to restore it to a place of industrial peace, where we have not only the few who have been taught what has been done and who did it, but also the great majority who have been taught what to do and how to do it.

England May Expect Invasion of Foes, Is Opinion of Expert

London, Sept. 18.—How seriously England regards the possibility of an invasion is shown by the following article by Colonel Repington, the noted military expert in the London Times. He writes:

'There would be only one course if the enemy landed. That would be for Kitchener to take the field. No doubt he would act with greatest vigor, but, not having all the strings in hand, he would act under a grave disadvantage. Meantime his absence from the War Office, where he has centralized all the power in his own hand, would practically arrest the administrative machine and we would have general chaos.

"We require a commander-in-chief of home forces, with a good staff, and with entire responsibility for home defense. If Canada could spare the Duke of Connaught he would be an ideal occupant for the post. He is a soldier to the core and younger than many commanders of German armies. He is active and energetic and is entirely trusted and beloved by the army."

GERMAN OFFICERS ARRIVE AT TURK CAPITAL DAILY

Athens, Sept. 18.—It is stated on the highest source that 250 German soldiers and officers reach Constantinople daily. It is declared the German-Austrian campaign against Serbia is due to begin within a fortnight.

Paris, Sept. 8.—An Athens dispatch says a royal decree has been issued calling out Greek reservists of the classes of 1886, 1887 and 1888 on October 1.

Relations between Greece and Bulgaria apparently are improving. In the most influential circles the conviction is said now to have been reached that neutrality must be the only policy for Greece.

It is learned from a diplomatic source that Germany has made extensive promises to Bulgaria. These promises were made to King Ferdinand by the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg on behalf of Emporer William, and among them was the stipulation that King Ferdinand should have the crown of Byzanitium.

Serbia has done her duty fully as an ally, said Premier Pachitch, as quoted by the correspondent at Nish of the Petit Parisien.

First, she has soundly beaten the Austrians in the field. Second, she has made the concessions asked of her by her great allies, in order to bring Bulgaria into the Balkan entente. Whether Bulgaria will come into the entente is another question.

Former Oswego Man Leaves J. P. Morgan Co.

Today's New York Herald contains the following:

Willard D. Straight, who for several years has been prominent in finance, journalism, politics and international affairs, will relinquish on October 1 his direct association with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. to pursue special studies in international law at Columbia University. Mr. Straight at present is associated with the Morgan firm in connection with Far aEstern and other international business and, while he will devote most of his time to his studies, which to him are not altogether new, it is unlikely that his association with the well known banking concern will be completely severed.

At his summer home, in Old Westbury, L. I., Mr. Straight said last evening that he had contemplated for some time the taking of a special course in international law, in which he is deeply interested. His acquaintance with the subject is known to be of long standing, and his studiesi n a measure will be a continuation of those begun several years ago. He said that should matters connected with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. require his attention after October 1 he will doubtless find time to devote to them.

Mr. Srtaight was born in Oswego, N. Y., in January, 1880. He was graduated from the Bordentown, N. J., Military Institute and Cornell, after which he was appointed to Sir Robert Hart's Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs Service, serving at Nanking and Peking for two years. During the Russo-Japanese war he represented the Reuter Agency and later the Associated Press as war correspondent.

In April, 1905, Mr. Straight was appointed Vice Consul General at Mukden. He handled several difficult diplomatic matters, and, returning to the United States in 1909, was for six months Acting Chief of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs of the State Department. He then received an appointment from an American group of bankers, headed by J. P. Morgan & Co. He was married in 1911 to Miss Dorothy Payne Whitney, daughter of the late William C. Whitney.

Progress of Prohibition.

In the referendum election in South Carolina, Tuesday, the proposition for state-wide prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages after January 1 next, was carried by a majority of nearly 20,000. The state at present is under a no-license system, the only way by which liquor can legally be sold being through county dispensaries.

The swinging of South Carolina into the prohibition column will extend the dry area in the south to all states except Alabama. In that state there is the license system, fees ranging from $900 to $3,000, according to population.

After January 1, the prohibition states will be Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia.—Utica Dispatch.

Stand by Employes.

Instances have been known in the history of organized labor in this country where excess of zeal on the part of union agents has stirred up discontent among employes, caused misunderstandings between them and their employers, ending, perhaps, in a costly strike, and reducing once prosperous and contented workers to idleness, misery and poverty. Naturally, intelligent, self-respecting workingmen and women resent the intrusion of outsiders into their affairs, but there are probably few cases on record where they have gone as far as the employes of the clothing factory in Cleveland, on a recent occasion, when they passed a strong list of resolutions contradicting statements that working conditions were not satisfactory; expressing "our strong disapproval of the action taken by an outside organization," and winding up with the statement that "we tender to our company our most earnest and sincere support for the present most fair methods of conducting the business." It would be just as fair to say that union agents were always selfish as to say that capital is always selfish. The real friends of labor are not the ones who are constantly stirring up discontent and strife over trivial matters.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

Lloyd-George Not Deceived.

Mr. Lloyd-George, in the preface of a volume of his speeches on the war and war conditions, just published, is frank. He admits that conditions are bad for the Allies; be says that the Allies are facing defeat; he is bold to declare that England is now the only hope.

"How many people in this country," says Mr. Lloyd-George, "fully apprehend to its full significance the Russian retreat? For over twelve months Russia, despite deficiencies in equipment, has absorbed the energies of half the German and four-fifths of the Austrian forces. It is realized that for the time being Russia has made her contributions to the struggle for European freedom, and that we cannot for some months to come expect the same active help from the Russian armies as we have hitherto received.

"Who is to take the Russian place while those Russian armies are re-equipping? Who is to have the weight which has hitherto fallen on Russian soldiers?

"France cannot be expected to sustain much heavier burdens than those she now bears with a quiet courage which has astonished and moved the world. Italy is putting her strength into the fight. There is only Britain left."

The British minister of munitions then goes on to ask whether Britain is prepared to do her duty in the crisis that confronts the Allies, and he adds that a "shrewd and sagacious observer told me the other day that in his judgment, the course pursued by this country during the next three months would decide the fate of the war."

Mr. George-Lloyd is, in deed, frankness personified. He is laboring under no delusions. He knows that it is up to his countrymen to prepare as they have never prepared before, and to fight as they have never fought before, if the Allies and Great Britain with them, are not to go down to defeat and disaster.—Rochester Herald.

A HOUSE CAT'S MESSAGE

Miss Lucy Price, anti-suffrage speaker, who was heard in a debate in this city at the Chautauqua with Miss Todd, is still explaining her views on the evils of equal suffrage. She is at the State Fair.

Miss Price is quoted as saying she wants to go home with her mother as she is a regular house cat. That she has a lovely mother, and such a comfortable home. Now, either Miss Price is expressing the truth of the matter or else she isn't. It is not to be doubted she is a house cat and has a lovely mother and a comfortable home, but it is strange how Miss Price's ideas on doing good in the world coincide with that of the equal suffrage believers in one point at least—that of going out into the tumbledy work-a-day world and helping it, if necessary, rather than waiting for the world to come to the threshold of that "comfortable home" where one lives like a "house cat." Miss Price has certainly proved her intelligence by showing that one must go where one believes his work to be, and that work may lie either in preaching the incompetency of one's sex from a rostrum or running a taxicab.

Miss Price evidently believes that she should be, and is, free to do her own special and peculiar work—even if it does take her and her "lovely mother" away from home. In her chosen work she does not see the grand principle that women, as well as men, to be happy, must do their own particular work in the world—in the complete use of their powers in the work.

That it has been the social custom for men to vote and women to not vote proves nothing. Law of man, social customs, are as nothing when they interfere with the laws that are for the well being of the human race.

It may be possible for Miss Price, and other women, too, to have a comfortable home and emulate a house cat, yet there are millions of women in the country who cannot purr out their existence. Either common sense or necessity sends them into factories, offices and divers professions. Why, then, should these be handicapped by false standards in labor conditions? Why not let them use the ballot to help work out the fullness of their service?

Equal suffrage means fair play.

THE FOOL FARM BOY

A failure farmer lived not far from my boyhood home, and he existed there for a long time—existed. During the day he had to work most of the time picking off the grubs that were eating his garden crops. He was too poor to get credit at the grocery and so hard up that they would arrest him if he should attempt to beg.

He told his troubles, and this made matters worse. No one would talk with him then, but they all talked of his troubles to some one else.

The mortgage was coming due on the little farm. His wife worried herself sick in the head, and worked herself sick in the body. His two children looked hungry, and they were.

He had a "fool" farm boy "workin' for board." One day this mental short-weight baited a hook with one of the grubs from the garden, and went to the upper end of the pond where the springs are cold, and there he caught a magnificent speckled trout.

Now there are no grubs in the garden, but a lot of trout customers in the city, and the farmer sleeps and eats in prosperity. He often refers to the hired hand as "the fool that does the chores."—The Silent Partner.

NEW YORK JEWS RAISE $500,000 AT SERVICES

New York, Sept. 17.—At sundown yesterday began Yom Kippur or Day of Atonement services. From early yesterday afternoon until the stars appear tonight orthodox Jews will abstain from food, drink and labor.

The memorial service for the dead is more pathetic than usual. It is estimated nearly half of the 500,000 Jewish soldiers fighting in the belligerent armies have been killed. In some instances, especially in Russia, the entire male side of families have been wiped out. Prayers will be offered for an early peace.

Part of the money collected in the synagogues will be sent to Europe to alleviate the sufferings and starvation among the Jewish families. A large sum will be sent to the Jews in Palestine. It is estimated that $500,000 will be collected for the relief work.

Your foresight may not be as good as your hindsight—but be cheerful about it anyway. You have lots of company in your boat.

HOME TOWN HELPS

HARD TO MAKE OVER CITY

Experiences of Centuries Old Towns Should Be Lesson to the Builders of Today.

The most hurried traveler along the tourist routes of Europe allows himself time to note with a smile that the "gates" which were once the veritable entrance through the walls into the city are now in the very heart of the city's bustling life.

Who does not know "Lud Gate" in London, now Ludgate Hill? Lud is the name of a mythical king of Britain.

The legend has it that this Lud laid the foundation of London. Shakespeare preserves his memory in "Cymbeline;" "And on the gates of Lud's town set your heads." This strong gate in the western part of the city is far enough removed from the west and is one of the busiest streets in the world.

Bishopsgate—the bishop gate; Aldgate—the old gate; Newgate—the new gate, all tell the same story. The "gates" are found in the innermost recesses of the city. The real entrances to the city are many miles away.

And what a higgledy-piggledy business it is! Boxes of brick and stone, in bewildering squares and parallelograms and shapeless shapes of every fashion, stretch away into dim distance, to straggle, to jostle, or to decay, as fate or fortune wills. There is not a city of any age in all Europe, now touched by the progressive spirit, which has not been for the last 30 years or will not be for the next 30 engaged in the titanic task of widening its old streets and constructing new ones.

But at what cost must the men and women of an unwalled and ungated city today make the place of their habitation habitable!

ADVANCE IN CITY LIGHTING

Hanging Arc Lamps so Installed That They Add to Instead of Detracting From Appearance.

Many of the old installations of hanging arc lamps are even uglier than the incandescents. The old arcs are usually suspended above the street on a tangle of wires and cables where they glare and sputter the long night through. But modern engineering and modern love of the beautiful, as well as the utility of a lighting system, have changed all this. The new systems of arc lighting are nothing like the old. The lamps are not hung above the street but crown the tops of ornamental standards placed alternately up and down the street. There are no hanging wires in sight, no sharp points of light to dazzle the eyes, no flicker and sputter. Instead of sharp, penetrating rays of bluish light the new luminous arc lamps give a flood of soft, white light which is many times more efficient and more economical than the light from the old lamps. The wire and cables are all underground, where they are safe and do not mar the natural beauty of the street. Shade trees do not have to be cut down or trimmed until they die.

Hints on Concrete Road Building.

Sprinkling the wearing surface of concrete roads during the construction period must be practically continuous on hot days unless there is some moisture-retaining medium present. Recent observations of a number of pieces of road construction, on which contractors new to the work were engaged, indicate that the inspector is having his hands full in getting the "wetting-down" specifications properly adhered to. Where earth is available a generous layer thrown on makes an excellent cover and holds water well. Some careful road builders in the West, recognizing the value of curing concrete under water, have made earth dams along the edges of concrete roads and divided the road longitudinally into a series of pools.—Engineering Record.

Boy Scouts Guarding Trees.

Philadelphia boy scouts are doing yeoman service in guarding the trees of the city from the caterpillar pest and other harm for which laws can be enforced to prevent mischief to forests and trees. The same plan is also being carried on in Burlington, Vt. It is an excellent idea to enlist the services of the boys in these preservative methods and teach them by this means to love and care for the trees, which the average city boy only enjoys for shade or as a convenient object from which to obtain a stick.

No Cause for Interference.

However brave the policemen are, they are careful about not breaking the laws and ordinances. A patrol man was kicking his feet down on the lake front in Chicago, so a story runs, when an excited citizen ran up to him and cried: "Say, hurry up! A man has just jumped off the pier!"

"With his clothes on?" asked the officer.

"Yes—fully dressed. Hurry!"

"What do you want me to do? There ain't no ordinance against a man swimmin' as long as he's properly dressed."

NEY AS A FIGHTER

Napoleon Called His Marshal the "Bravest Man I Ever Saw."

THE RETREAT FROM MOSCOW.

Where the Heroic Commander With a Mere Handful of Men as a Rear Guard Fell Back, Facing the Foe. Minor Heroes of the Great Conflict.

Three towering personalities came to the clinch on the field of Waterloo. There are perhaps a half dozen names remembered in connection with that epoch making battle, but they are little more than names; only Bluecher, Napoleon and Wellington have contrived to outlive the memory of their contemporaries.

Yet there were some at Waterloo who were not only brave fighters, but vastly interesting individuals, and it is more than unfortunate that they should have suffered eclipse. There is perhaps one exception. One cannot scratch the history surrounding any of the three great commanders who met at Waterloo without encountering Michael Ney, Napoleon's "bravest of the brave."

It is impossible to think of Ney except in superlatives. It is impossible to collect dry facts about him; the temper that matched his hair smolders through and sets them alfaze. Even Napoleon, always so unpleasantly eager to shift the blame for failure to other shoulders, wrote from the solitude of St. Helena, "Ney was the bravest man I ever saw."

One of his officers once asked him if he ever felt fear. "Never had time," was the curt reply.

The tales of his daring, his hairbreadth escapes, his unbelievable indifference to shot and shell, are legion.

He was always calmest in time of the greatest peril, and it was this quality that Napoleon appreciated. Again and again France and the crown were in Michael Ney's hands. Whenever Napoleon saw that the issue of a battle turned on a single point he sent Ney to that point. At the battle of Bautzen the emperor lay on the ground which is sheltered by a height from the town. He heard Ney's guns on the left. A bomb burst over his head. He sat down and wrote Marie Louise that the victory was gained. He waited only to learn that Ney was where the crisis turned to be sure of victory.

But the most dramatic chapter of this gallant fighter's life is that headed "The Retreat from Moscow." Meissonier might better have painted the rear of the Corsican's army than the van. He would have had a more appealing, a more gallant subject in Michael Ney, retreating with his face to the enemy. With a mere handful of men he flung himself between the fleeing French and the Russian army and backed slowly, stubbornly from Moscow.

This is the man who a little later was publicly shot as a traitor to France.

Ney's fellow marshal, Grouchy, does not fare so well. Grouchy was a loyal French patriot, and he had a record of engagement in 200 battles, which offered copious proof that he was no coward. But light headed, irresolute, vacillating he surely was. The Waterloo mistake is merely a repetition of earlier failures of judgment.

One of the most interesting of the minor heroes of Waterloo was the soldier-musician Graf Friedrich Wilhelm Buelow. He had been thrown a little in the shade by the vehement personality of his chief, Bluecher, and the intrepid Gneisenau. But the man who at the head of his 30,000 emerged at 1 o'clock in the afternoon of June 18, 1815, from the wood of St. Armand and turned the tide of the battle of Waterloo stands out as a romantic figure. Probably no one of Germany's brave fighters of that racking period, excepting not even "Old Forward" himself, was so well loved, so vigorously admired, as Friedrich Buelow. He was a gentleman and a man of well seasoned culture.

But to find the most truly picturesque in the group of lesser generals at Waterloo one must go over to the English side. "As rough, foul mouthed a devil as ever lived," said Wellington himself of Sir Thomas Picton. "But," he added, "no man could do better in the different services assigned to him."

He always carried a stick to tap on the horse's mane when he felt over impatient and wave in the air to emphasize his commands. Sometimes he carried an umbrella, as at Vittoria, where he used it to beat Wellington's butler over the head. The unfortunate man was escorting the headquarters baggage and got in the march of Picton's division.

The visitor to the field of Waterloo, even though he know little of the personality of this fine old fighter, feels a thrill when the guide says, "Here Picton fell."

There could be no sharper contrast to Tom Picton than Sir Rowland Hill. The mild eyed, sweet tempered, ruddy cheeked general, soon to become the most influential politician in Europe, was the complete picture of an English country gentleman.—Chicago Herald.

DEPARTMENT ADVISES TO GET GOOD SEED

The U. S. Department of Agriculture advises farmers as follows:

"Owing to the generally backward state if this year's corn crop in many of the northern, but important growing sections of the corn belt, there is danger of injury to the crop by killing frost, the occurrence of which may be expected at any time. It is, therefore, important that every effort possible be made to secure good seed for the next year's crop. Where any last year's corn is left it should be gone over and the best ears saved for seed. Morevoer, as corn matures unevenly, it is possible to secure seed from the early ears before the rest of the crop is matured.

CZARINA ACTIVE AS RED CROSS NURSE

Two Daughters Also Tireless In Aid of Russian Hospitals.

AUTHOR SEES THEM WORK.

Took Three Months' Course and Is Now Doing Active Service—Two Hundred Soldiers and Thirty Officers Are Being Treated at Base In Which Her Majesty Serves.

Petrograd.—The Russian Red Cross is bearing a tremendous burden. Its self sacrifice, endurance, efficiency and democracy astonish the world. All classes have striven to do "their bit."

About fifteen miles from Petrograd there is a little town, the "Windsor" of the czar of Russia. A year ago court carriages, beautiful ladies, well groomed men thronged the streets of this place. All was sunshine and glitter.

Then the storm came. All Russia rose to fight her enemy. The life of that little village and of the empire changed entirely.

Everybody felt the seriousness of the situation. Russian women came to assist their husbands and brothers, and at their head came the czarina herself.

Her majesty and her two elder daughters, Olga and Tatiana, went to a lady doctor, Princess Gedroyc, and asked to be instructed in the art of nursing the wounded. They entered on a three months' course and passed examinations like any other professional nurses. Every day for three months Princess Gedroyc trained these three imperial sisters of the Red Cross for their examinations.

"I felt exceedingly honored," writes Waclaw Czerniewski, "when her majesty gave me permission to visit on several occasions her hospital and to see her work. Moreover, she gave me personally her portrait. Never before had any journalist been admitted to this hospital. Modesty is characteristic of her majesty. She works quietly and laboriously. The hospital where the czarina and her imperial daughters work every day from 9 a. m. until 2 p. m. accommodates 200 soldiers and thirty officers and has a well arranged operating theater, a commodious surgical dressing ward, well equipped X ray research and laboratory.

"At the head of the staff is Princess Gedroyc, a woman of strong character, who, with the help of two male doctors and several sisters, including the imperial nurses, carries on her arduous task with energy and devotion. The czarina and her daughters obey Princess Gedroyc like the other sisters, and indeed she does not make any difference between them, her sole endeavor being the alleviation of human suffering. During operations Princess Gedroyc gives orders to the czarina, who as her assistant hands her the necessary instruments."

TRICKING SUBMARINES.

Ruses by Which Vessels May Escape Their Torpedo Attacks.

It is the surprise attack which in nearly every case enables a submarine to torpedo a hostile ship. There are several maneuvers by means of which a ship can trick a submarine. Several vessels have diverted torpedoes by swinging round their stern until it points in the direction of the undersea craft. In this way the wash of the propellers has deflected the torpedo from its course and it has sped harmlessly past its mark. Another successful ruse is to stoke up the furnaces of a ship chased by a submarine, and thick, black smoke belches from its funnels and envelops the vessel in a protective shroud. In this way the submarine gunners are confused and cannot perceive the correct direction in which to send their torpedo.

A speedy ship which follows an erratic, zigzag course presents a poor mark to a submarine. When a torpedo is dispatched against a fast traveling vessel it is directed to a point just ahead of its mark, and the craft literally runs into the death dealing device. This obviously cannot happen, however, if a ship is swinging rapidly from side to side and alternately pointing the narrow expanse of its bows or stern to the undersea marksmen.

A submarine seldom attacks a vessel if it is not alone, for it can only attack one at a time, and while it is launching a torpedo at its first mark the second vessel has an excellent opportunity of ramming the submarine, which can be located by its telltale periscope.—Pearson's Weekly.

THE ENTRANCE HALL.

Make It Suit Not Visitors, but the Occupants of the Home.

Is anything new to be said about the entrance hall? The smallest room in most houses, it is usually given in the plans an amount of attention that might seem out of all proportion to the rest of the house. And yet the ordinary entrance, whether it be a mere vestibule, a spacious hall of the colonial style or, as in our present day fashions, a part of the living room set off by an archway, is quite unsatisfactory. It is unsatisfactory for this reason—that the entrance way is designed and decorated from the standpoint of the impression it makes on visitors, whereas the impression we should seek is not that made upon guests, but upon ourselves, the occupants of the house.

Too often we give the entrance a severe treatment that impresses the student of beauty or that amazes the less discriminating visitor by the other extreme of lavish display. But how does either of these two types of entrance affect those who come into the house many times every day, the good man and his good wife and their children? Is it a room that by its suggestion of rest and repose tempts one after a hard day's work at the office to drop into the first easy chair that comes along, or does it irritate the nerves and keep one going, restless and uneasy, wandering from the entrance to the living room and from the living room to the study and thence to the attic by way of the basement?—Good Health.

Suppressing Swearing.

Profane as well as legal oaths have been the subject of many parliamentary measures in England. No fewer than five separate bills having the prevention of swearing for their object were presented during the reign of James I., but it was not until 1623 that an enactment was finally carried defining and controlling the offense. In 1635 a public department was established to collect the fines enforced by this law. The officials of this department, of whom one was appointed in every parish, were allowed 2s. 6d. in the pound on the money thus collected, and the balance was paid over to the bishop for the benefit of the deserving poor. These penalties ceased to be enforced after the restoration, but were revived by a statute of William and Mary and still further increased under George II.

Stereoscopic Surveying.

There is in use a stereoscopic method of photographic surveying. Photographs are taken at two points with a surveying camera, the plates being exposed in the vertical plane passing through both stations. The developed plates, or positives from them, being then placed in a stereoscopic measuring machine that combines the pictures, a brief calculation gives the exact position of any desired point. The effective range of the instrument is put at about five miles, and the method is said to be of particular advantage in mapping large areas of mountainous country.

THE BARD OF AVON

Now It Is Alleged That Shakespeare Was Illiterate.

COULD NOT WRITE, IT IS SAID.

An Expert In Such Things Claims That an Analysis of the Signatures Left by the Immortal William Strips Him of All Literary Credit.

The question of who did "write Shakespeare" does not concern William McConway, who has written a monograph on his Shakespeare theories, so much as "could William Shakespeare of Stratford-on-Avon write at all?" Mr. Conway is convinced that, whoever did write the plays, it was not the bard of Avon, so called. He bases his belief on evidence presented by certain existing signatures made by William Shakespeare and which seem to prove him to have been an illiterate man.

Mr. McConway admits that, though so evidently illiterate, Shakespeare possessed native ability, manifested by his money getting faculties, and adds the fact that as a theatrical manager Shakespeare secured to himself the plays that he did and thus stamped himself a competent man of business and a judge of public taste. But in regard to certain deficiencies exhibited by his signature Mr. McConway, after having made a study of the characteristics of signatures, says:

"Observations of the efforts and performances of illiterate men in the laborious production of signatures has led me to the conclusion that here was a man ashamed of his inability to write, made so by his associations and the rise in his condition of life, seeking to cover his intellectual nakedness with a garment provided by a sympathizing friend.

"The sympathizing friend in this instance floated into the imagination in the form of some scrivener who 'set the copy' so laboriously reproduced in the form of the signatures to the deed and mortgage of 1613 and to the will of 1616."

Mr. McConway refers to the original documents unearthed by Professor Wallace in 1910, and his theory is that the solicitor who drew up the papers of the mortgage and of the will is the man who made for Shakespeare a copy of his name, which the illiterate Shakespeare then followed in scrawling, uncertain imitation to make the signatures to the documents. This saved him from the humiliation of having to make "his X mark."

A second document put in evidence by Mr. McConway is a fragment relating to litigation in respect to certain money interests in the Globe theater. In this fragment appears, in two places, the name "Wilm. Shakespeare," written by the professional scrivener who prepared the case. Mr. McConway points out that Shakespeare's own signature appended is a laborious imitation, performed by a man who could not read his chirography when he had written it.

Mr. McConway is convinced that this scrivener is the man who made the copy which enabled "Wilm. Shakespeare" to execute legal papers without the humiliation of the "X mark." The rule of legal procedure required the evidence to be written out and signed by the witness before leaving the presence of the court.

"Special attention is called to this signature," says Mr. McConway, "as it is much abbreviated. The 'great dramatist,' who had at his command, as evidenced by his putative works, a wealth of words measuring five times the number gathered into the dictionary of the time, uses but a moiety of the characters which he had been taught to use as the ideograph to represent his name.

"We are told that he was instructed to appear later before the court for a further examination, but the record nowhere shows that he ever appeared, although the other witnesses appeared a second time. Would they be considered cynical who might surmise that the position in which Shakespeare of Stratford found himself when called upon to attach his signature to the record in open court was one of extreme embarrassment in that he could not without some exposure of ignorance use his 'copy' to guide his pen?"—New York Sun.

INDIAN SUMMER.

The Term May Have Had Its Origin In the Far East.

The origin of the term "Indian summer," like that of the word "blizzard," has been the subject of much research. It has been traced back only as far as the latter part of the eighteenth century, and it did not become common until after the first decade of the nineteenth.

Many explanations of the name have been offered, all of which assume that the term "Indian" used in this connection refers to the American Indians.

A recent note in the Monthly Weather Review calls attention to a totally different use of this term, in which the reference is not to the American Indians, but to East India.

Under the British board of trade regulations one of the load lines marked on ships bears the initials "I. S.," this being the maximum depth to which vessels can be loaded for voyages during the "Indian summer"—i. e., the fine season in the Indian seas.

How long has the term "Indian summer" been used in this sense? It is not recorded in any dictionary nor apparently in any work on meteorology. Is it possible that our autumnal Indian summer was so named by sailors or travelers who saw in it a resemblance to the fine weather attending the northeast monsoon in India?

Earliest Watches.

Some of the earliest watches were made in Nuremberg. Their shape was almost round, and they were called "Nuremberg eggs."

ITALIAN SUBMARINE UNDER WATER FOR SEVENTY HOURS

Given Up as Lost, the Nereide Returns Safely to Its Base.

Praise is being showered upon the crew of the Italian submarine Nereide, who through an accident were compelled to remain beneath the surface for seventy hours without food or light and their supply of oxygen almost exhausted before the engines were repaired and the vessel was able to reach her base in safety, greatly to the surprise of naval officials, who believed the craft was lost. Even the ministry of marine accepted the report from Vienna to the effect that the Nereide, one of Italy's newer submarines, had been destroyed by an Austrian war vessel.

Hour after hour in the stifling, brain bursting interior of the submarine, without sleep, without rest, they worked. Then the thickening fumes took their toll of the commander, and a subordinate directed the work. The men lost trace of time. Once they obtained a few revolutions of the screw, and a faint, husky cheer used up more of the precious oxygen. But their exhilaration was brief, for the motors stopped again, and the work had to be done all over.

Two more men collapsed and were barely kept alive when the chief engineer, exploring with blind fingers, found the seat of trouble and at length repaired it. The motors started once more. Slowly the shell began to rise from the bottom. The periscope reached the surface and found a clear sea. Out from the water came the hull, and the hatch of the conning tower was opened for the first breath of fresh air in three long days. But it was too late for the three men in collapse below. They died without regaining consciousness. Two more men died on the way to port.

When to Stop Advertising.

An English journal requested a number of the largest advertisers to give their opinions concerning the best time to stop advertising, and the following replies were received:

When the population ceases to multiply and the generation that crowded on after you and never heard of you stops coming on.

When you have convinced everybody whose life will touch yours that you have better goods and lower prices than he can get anywhere else.

When you stop making fortunes solely through the direct use of this mighty agent.

When younger and fresher houses in your line cease starting up.

When you would rather have your own way and fail than take advice and win.

Guards Sent to Prison.

The nine deputies who were convicted recently in Trenton, N. J., of having fired into a group of strikers at the Williams & Clark depot in Roosevelt were sentenced by Justice Bergen to terms of not less than two years nor more than ten years in state prison on each man. The convictions were for manslaughter.

GASOLINE GOES HIGHER, RUMOR

Fulton Dealers Get 18 Cents, but 20 Cents May be Exceeded; Hugo Talks on Alternatives.

"There has been much anxiety in the motoring world of late over the rise in the price of gasoline, but it is not so much the grievance of the moment as the fear of the future that agitates the motorist most," says Francis M. Hugo. "The power of the gasoline producers is beginning to be realized and it is seen not only that gasoline is going to increase in price in years to come, but that the amount of the increase may possibly be very large. There is, therefore, a determination to experiment with alternative fuels, of which there are several more or less suitable, and to adopt carburetors constructed for their proper vaporization."

The most favored of alternative fuels is paraffin, which in consequence of the comparative difficulty of breaking it up properly into vapor form, needs a special design of carburetor, but the only drawbacks are, odor, oiliness and a tendency to produce carbon deposits in the cylinders. There are, however, a great number of paraffin engines, which have done satisfactory work for a number of years past. Benzol is in many ways superior to paraffin and it has the advantage of being easily vaporized and its behavior in the caburetor and cylinders is very similar to that of gasoline. The only objections to its use seem to be that a sticky deposit may be left in the cylinders, while the odor of exhaust has the disagreeable smell of sulphur. It will be seen, therefore, that it is a serious competitor of gasoline.

The only other available liquid fuel, which can now be considered, is alcohol. But this spirit does not present the same prospect as paraffin or benzol, while the difficulties attending its manufacture in large quantities renders it unlikely that it would be generally used as a power producer for many years to come. The general conclusion, therefore, to which these considerations lead is that if the motor car world desires to escape from the grip of the wholesale gasoline producers, it must undertake seriously and systematically experiments with benzol and paraffin and that manufacturers of automobiles must consider new designs for carburetors which will use heavier fuels.

It is obviously useless to complain that gasoline producers are obtaining higher prices than for years past and it would seem that scientific investigation should be made with these substitutes and when either of these can be used without difficulty it is pretty safe to assume that the price of gasoline will not only cease to rise but will show a tendency to fail. In this direction lies the hope of the motorist for cheaper fuel.

OSWEGO GAINED 10 P. C. IN 10 YRS.

City Ranks High Among Others in State, All Due to Returned Prosperity.

Albany, Sept. 18.—Showing a gain of approximately ten per cent. during the past fivey ears Oswego now has a population, including inmates of institutions within its borders, of 25,428. Since 1910 Oswego has gained 2,067 residents, a remarkable increase in view of the fact that during the eight years from 1892 to 1900 there was a gain off but 233 and from 1900 to 1905 of fbut 372, while the cenusu figures of 1910 show that Oswego made a gain of 789 during the five years previous.

Oswego's alien population is large owing to its location, the June figures giving the Lake Ontario city 2,495, so classified.

Between 1892 and the present time Oswego's growth amounts to 3,462, of which 2,067 has taken place during the last five years, giving evidence of the prosperity which has lately returned to the city. For a city of its size Oswego's gain in population during the last few years ranks among the leaders of the state.

By wards the June enumeration shows the present population, citizens and aliens, to be as follows:

First ward, 3,925; aliens, 480; total, 4,405.

Second ward, 1,808; aliens, 396; total, 2,204.

Third ward, 3,703; aliens, 249; total, 3,952.

Fourth ward, 3,729; aliens, 212; total, 3,842.

Fifth ward, 2,820; aliens, 580; total, 3,400.

Sixth ward, 2,441; aliens, 65; total, 2,506.

Seventh ward, 1,957; aliens, 365; total, 2,322.

Eighth ward, 2,909; aliens, 148; total, 3.157.

TEN DAYS UNTIL THE PRIMARY DAY

About ten days remain before primary day. The political parties will then place in nomination the candidates whose names appear on the official ballots election day. There are contests in several wards of the city over supervisor and aldermanic nominations. There are no contests over county office nominations, except in the case of the nomination for coroner on the Republican ticket.

It is time for the enrolled voter to acquaint himself thoroughly with the various candidates and their qualifications. It is an easy task for the voter to accumulate pretty definite information about all of the candidates who are being considered for nominations, and he will be able to determine with accuracy which man comes the nearest to fulfilling his ideas as to what a public office holder should be. Voters are urged to accumulate all the information they can and then decide for themselves; not acting at the suggestion of someone who, perhaps, knows less about the candidates and certainly less about the political ideals of the voter than the voter knows himself.

The direct primary, crude as it is in New York State, gives an opportunity to choose candidates without any manipulation like that of the old caucus system. But its only success is based on the attendance of citizens. Bear in mind that primary day is Tuesday, September 28.

The Woman's Missionary Society of Central Association of Congregational churches will hold an all-day conference in the Congregational church of Oswego on Thursday, September 23. The morning session will begin at 10:30 and the afternoon session will close at 4 o'clock. The ladies are requested to carry their own basket lunch and coffee will be provided. Special speakers will be Mrs. F. Z. Wilcox of New York, Secretary of the Woman's Work of the A. M. A., and Miss Helen B. Calder of Boston, Home Secretary of the Woman's Board.

The members of the Woman's Missionary Union of the Congregational church are urged to attend and take the car leaving Fulton at 10:20 a. m.

WOMEN'S C. T. UNION TO HOLD CONVENTION

Pulaski, Sept. 17.—Members of the local branch of the W. C. T. U. are actively engaged in making preparations for the thirty-eighth annual convention of the Oswego County Union, to be held at the First Baptist church, here October 13 and 14. The opening session of the first day will be at 3 p. m. and Mrs. G. M. Gardenier of Oswego, president of the county union, is cheduled to prisede. Miss Abbie M. Cogswell of the same city will conduct devotional services. The address of welcome will be delivered by Mrs. Alta Maltby Austin, Port st., president of the local union, and the response will be by Mrs. E. C. Spencer of Phoenix. Sessions will be held that evening and the next morning and afternoon. Many addresses and talks will be given by representatives from all portions of the county.

ATTENDING CAYUGA COUNTY CONVENTION

Mr. and Mrs. Aurie Palmer and Mr. and Mrs. William Middleton, who are interested at all times in work relating to rural mail carriers, will motor today to Auburn to attend a carriers' convention comprising Cayuga county. The trip was made by automobile.

WEATHER CAUSING LEAVES TO TURN COLOR

No frosts have been recorded thus far this season and yet leaves are turning yellow and falling from trees in a few places in the city.

Ordinarily it is effects of the frosts that cause the foliage to change color and fall, but in this year of exceptional and extraordinary weather conditions there have been no frosts to start the leaves on their downward way. The reason for it, it is explained by foresters, is found in the extraordinary weather conditions.

The long period of rainy weather, covering most of the summer, followed by the hot days of the past fortnight, is responsible for the fact that some of the trees in the city are almost denuded of foliage. This is especially true of the elms. Maples are also affected.

Leaves attained an unusual growth during the period of moist, cool days, but they did not become hardy enough to withstand the rays of the sun when eventually the unobscured orb began shining forth. It is said that the leaves were so delicate that the sun burned them, producing an affect almost exactly like that of frosts. For more than a week the wagons engaged in hauling away street litter have been carting off leaves swept or raked off lawns.

The foresters say that this is a waste; that if people only understood the value of leaves as a fertilizing agency, they would be piled up and weighed down to pass through the stages of composing for the enrichment of gardens and flower beds. The leaves are nature's own fertilizer.—Auburn Advertiser.

Franklin on Fresh Air.

Experience has convinced me of my Error. I now look upon fresh Air as a friend; I even sleep with an open Window. I am persuaded that no common Air from without is so unwholesome as the Air within a close Room, that has been often breath'd and not changed. Moist Air, too, which formerly I thought Pernicious, gives me no Apprehensions. You physicians have of late happily discovered that fresh and cool Air does good to Persons in the Smallpox and other Fevers. It is to be hoped that in another Century or two we may find out that it is not bad even for People in Health.—Benjamin Franklin.

Arithmetic by Hand.

We shall never be in danger of forgetting that our ancestors did their sums on their fingers so long as arithmetic retains the word "digits." But modern civilization knows nothing of the elaborate developments of this method. It takes a Wallachian peasant to multiply 8 by 9 on his hands. This is how he does it: The fingers of either hand, beginning with the thumb, stand for the numbers from 6 to 10. So the ring finger of one hand and the middle finger of the other are stuck out to represent 8 and 9. Counting the fingers remaining on the side farthest from the thumbs, he finds them 1 and 2 respectively, and 1 multiplied by 2 gives him the units of his product—2. Then he counts from the thumbs to the stuck out fingers inclusive, finds them 3 and 4, adds these and gets 7 for his tens. Answer, 72. All this to avoid knowing the multiplication table beyond 4 times 4!

Napoleon's Temper.

A story is told of a sudden rage into which Napoleon I. fell one day as he was at dinner. He had scarcely partaken of a mouthful when apparently some inopportune thought or recollection stung his brain to madness, and, receding from the table without rising from his chair—his small stature permitted that—he uplifted his foot—dash went the table, crash went the dinner, and the emperor sprang up, intending to pace the room. Quick as a flash his waiter scratched a few magic symbols on a bit of paper, and the emperor's check had grown more than double. Napoleon appreciated the delicacy of his attendant and said, "Thank you, my dear Dunand," with one of his inimitable smiles. The hurricane had blown over.

Self Reliance.

"Never complain about what you can't help," said Mr. Optim.

"And yet," replied Mr. Pessim, "there's no excuse for complaining about anything else."—Washington Star.

NEW YORK FARM EXHIBIT IS FINE

Shares Honors With Four Western States; Illinois First In Corn Exhibit.

San Francisco, Sept. 17.—Nine thousand New oYrkers have registered at their state's farming exhibit in Agricultural Hall since the opening of the exposition. The exhibit is located at the interseceion of two main avenues. In the centre is a mammoth cartoon model of the state, showing the location of the dairies, cheese factories and pulp mills. Around the walls are other models, and hung up against the rear of the booth are illuminated pictures of farm life and the state forests of New York.

Almost all the farming products of New York are on display, and statistics are prominently displayed which show that in corn, oats and potatoes an acre of New York soil is more productive and more profitable than an acre in any other state. The dairy exhibits have been featured. New York won a grand prize for cheese and milk in spite of the fact that the latter was shipped 3,000 miles. The two exhibits attracting most attention from strangers are the moving sign which shows another advantage of the State of New York every 30 seconds as long as one cares to watch it, and the colossal cheese. This cheese was the largest that was ever manufactured. It was six feet high, four feet wide and weighed 1,500 lbs. Twenty-five factories were needed to furnish the 150,000 pounds of milk required. The cheese was first cut by Governor Whitman during his visit to the exposition, and though every visitor was given a piece of cheese, 26 days elapsed before all was disposed of.

The exhibit is making an effort to bring men back to the eastern farm. It offers convincing argument that the low-priced land of New York will pay more per acre on an investment that the expensive land in the West. With modern scientific methods one of the old "abandoned farms" in New York paid 6 per cent. interest on an investment of $9,000 per acre for a period of six years. New York State is one of the few which have a moving picture theatre attached to its agricultural exhibit. Six reels of New York farm conditions are shown here daily. If a man is interested he is shown statistics of freight rates, soil analysis in the various counties and other information.

Arkansas Agricultural Exhibit.

The Arkansas Agricultural Exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition is held in a booth whose prevailing colors are blue and yellow. The walls and the columns are trimmed with cotton and wheat, and covered with fine specimens of the products of the farms and the factories of the state. Arkansas is remarkable among the state exhibits on account of the variety of its products. In addition to its usual exhibits of grain, cotton and forage, Arkansas has its famous yams, apples and garden produce. The apples have been awarded a golden medal. Northern visitors can scarcely believe that the yams exude so much sugar that they foul the stove. All are interested in the clay from Arkansas' diamond mine, the only one in the United States; and in the crystals from the Hot Springs. The exhibit well illustrates both the developed and the undeveloped resources of Arkansas. In addition to its instructive features, the harmonious display of colors of unique design are deserving of the attention paid them by the crowds of strangers and natives of Arkansas.

Illinois State Exhibit.

The Illinois Corn Growers' Association won first premium at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The prizewinning samples are displayed in the Illinois State Agricultural exhibit, which 1130 Illinoisans see daily. The illutstrations shown here of the effect of breeding on cort are atttracting a good deal of notice from farmers. Another table is devoted to the products which are made from corn in Illinois.

The decoration of the Illinois booth is unique and interestin. The walls are covered with pictures and statistics of the packing industry, which are trimmed with heads of grain and bunches of forage. The state seal composed of flint and Kafir corn is specially worthy of notice. The exhibit gives a good idea of the importance of farming in Illinois, and the crops in which this state exceeds all others.

Iowa Wins Medals.

Fourteen thousand Iowans have registered at the Horn of Plenty in the state agricultural pavilion at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The Horn is fully 20 feet above the floor, and from it a flood of corn has poured down to the floor in a semi-circular pile 20 feet across at the base. Halfway up the word Iowa has been spelled in red corn, which contrasts admirably with the yellow corn making up the pile.

Passages trimmed with wheat and forage pass beneath this exhibit, which has been awarded the Grand Prize for beauty. Iowa is judged to have the best state display of the 12 states competing. The number of prizes granted individual exhibits of farm products grown by Iowans is the talk of the exposition. Out of 189 competing, 185 received awards of some sort. Many of the were medals of honor and gold medals.

HARDEST FIGHT CENTERS ABOUT CANDIDATES FOR COUNTY COMMITTEEMEN

That the fight for the Mayoralty this year will be hotly contested and perhaps productive of as much bitter feeling as the fight on the commission government question, are among the statements heard in political circles. With the majority of the Republicans and not a few Democrats and men of other political creeds lining up behind Victor C. Lewis and the local Democratic organization and several of the Republican leaders, if reports are to be credited, supporting Myron Foster, the battle is already well under way. James Brooks, the Prohibition and Independent nominee, is also a factor to be reckoned with, and his popularity is expected to draw many votes.

The fight in the Fourth and Fifth wards between Harry Webb and Dr. H. L. Lake and W. L. Woodbury and J. A. Bort, is also attracting the complete attention of the residents of those districts. Friends of Mr. Bort predict that their candidate will swamp Mr. Woodbury, who is Myron Stranahan's choice for the office, and Dr. Lake is expected to make a strong run against Harry Webb. Mr. Stranahan's friends regard the candidacy of Dr. Lake and Mr. Bort as the result of personal feeling against the organization forces, and dissatisfaction among certain other local Republicans.

On the West Side, Otto Malone, Republican, and an employe of the American Woolen Company, is the candidate for alderman against the present incumbent, William Sullivan, Democrat. Both men are popular and, although the Second ward is generally regarded as a Democratic stronghold, friends of Mr. Malone are sanguine regarding his chances of election.

The petition of Louis W. Emerick for alderman in the Fifth ward has been withdrawn. It is stated that Mr. Emerick's position was faulty, in that it did not carry enough signatures, and other advices say he declined to run. His entrance into the field against Frank Quirk, the present incumbent, also a Republican, was productive of not a little partisanship among the Republican voters of the ward and is partly responsible, it is said, for the fight against Mr. Webb and Mr. Woodbury as committeemen.

The sad plight of England in raising a volunteer army to go against the finest troops in the world is not without wholesome effect in this country. Several large employing concerns have offered liberal inducements to members of the national guard to respond to the call to drills and instruction camps. The employers take the ground that they, too, are serving the country by helping guardsmen in their employ to prepare for the national defense and at the same time maintain their positions in the industrial field. Not very long ago it was not unusual for employers to warn guardsmen in the service that absence could not be excused on account of military duty. If the defense of this country is to be wholly or practically so in the hands of the "citizenry," then all citizens should contribute in some way. The burden should not fall entirely upon young men, most of whom have their way to make in the world. To put all the burden upon the strictly military element would be to penalize youthful manhood and youthful enterprise and ambition. That system would be no more democratic than the odious conscription system of continental Europe.

Anyway, He Wasn't.

"Own up, now. Who's the head of your family?"

"My wife used to be," admitted Mr. Enpeck, "but since my daughters are grown up we have a commission form of government."—Exchange.

COLDFOOTED MINETTOANS FEARED LOCAL STARS

The Fourth st. school baseball team yesterday defeated the Minetto baseball team, score 0-0. Neither side saw first and neither side saw the other. The local boys invested $2.25 for carfare and telephone toll.

Captain Wallace of the local team challenged Manager Davis of Minetto by wire for a game of baseball at 3 o'clock at "Lose Your Ball Park," Minetto. When the local boys arrived they found nothing but the busy streets of the village. Captain Fletcher of Minetto had to help papa thresh and several other players were camping. As a result the Fulton lads took up a collection and purchased a 10c ball at the shoe, clothing, candy and tobacco sotre and returned to "Lose Your Ball Park" and Mr. Lego, the first clubman, knocked the ball into the pitcher's hands. Mr. Youmans, the star clubman, knocked a home run and the ball has not been found yet.

The line-up for Fulton follows: Youmans, p., Cole, c., DeBarber, 1b., Wallace, 2b., Braun, 3b., Lego, rf., Rathbun, cf., Stanley, lf., M. Kaplan, ss.

How to Write Advertising Copy

By HERBERT KAUFMAN

Author of "Do Something! Be Something!"

A SKILLED layer of mosaic works with small fragments of stone—they fit into more places than the larger chunks.

The skilled advertiser works with small words—they fit into more minds than big phrases.

The simpler the language the greater certainty that it will be understood by the least intelligent reader.

The construction engineer plans his roadbed where there is a minimum of grade—he works along the lines of least resistance.

The advertisement which runs into mountainous style is badly surveyed—all minds are not built for high grade thinking.

Advertising must be simple. When it is tricked out with the jewelry and silks of literary expression, it looks as much out of place as a ball dress at the breakfast table!

The buying public is only interested in facts. People read advertisements to find out what you have to sell.

The advertiser who can fire the most facts in the shortest time gets the most returns. Blank cartridges make noise but they do not hit—blank talk, however clever, is only wasted space.

You force your salesmen to keep to solid facts—you don't allow them to sell muslin with quotations from Omar or trousers with excerpts from Marie Corelli. You must not tolerate in your printed selling talk anything that you are not willing to countenance in personal salesmanship.

Cut out clever phrases if they are inserted to the sacrifice of clear explanations—write copy as you talk. Only be more brief. Publicity is costlier than conversation—ranging in price downward from $10 a line; talk is not cheap, but the most expensive commodity in the world.

Sketch in your ad to the stenographer. Then you will be so busy "saying it" that you will not have time to bother about the gewgaws of writing. Afterwards take the typewriten manuscript and cut out every word and every line that can be erased without omitting an important detail. What remains in the end is all that really counted in the beginning.

Cultivate brevity and simplicity. "Savon Français" may look smarter, but more people will understand "French Soap." Sir Isaac Newton's explanation of gravitation covers six pages but the schoolboy's terse and homely "What goes up must come down" clinches the whole thing in six words.

Indefinite talk wastes space. It is not 100% productive. The copy that omits prices sacrifices half its pulling power—it has a tendency to bring lookers instead of buyers. It often creates false impressions. Some people are bound to conceive the idea that the goods are higher priced than in reality—others, by the same token, are just as likely to infer that the prices are lower and go away thinking that you have exaggerated your statements.

The reader must be searched out by the copy. Big space is cheapest because it doesn't waste a single eye. Publicity must be on the offensive. There are far too many advertisers who keep their lights on top of their bushel—the average citizen hasn't time to overturn your bushel.

Small space is expensive. Like a one-flake snowstorm, there is not enough of it to lay.

Space is a comparative matter after all. It is not a case of how much is used but how it is used. The passengers on the limited express may realize that Jones has tacked a twelve-inch shingle on every post and fence for a stretch of five miles, but they are going too fast to make out what the shingles say, yet the two-feet letters of Brown's big bulletin board on top of the hill leap at them before they have a chance to dodge it. And at that it doesn't cost nearly so much as the sum total of Jones' dinky display.

Just so advertisements attractively displayed every day or every week for a year in one newspaper will find the eye of all readers, no matter how rapidly they may be "going" through the advertising pages, and produce more results than a dozen piking pieces of copy scattered through half a dozen papers.

SYNOPSIS

Old Cyrus Martin, the head of the American soap trust, makes a bet of $30,000 with a friend, John Clark, a rival soapmaker, that his (Martin's) son Rodney would be making more money at the end of a year than Clark's son Ellery.

Martin takes his pretty secretary, Mary Grayson, into his confidence and enlists her co-operation. Rodney has been a spendthrift, and the father wants to make him reform and go to work.

Mary meets Rodney, and the son proposes marriage to her. Rodney tells his father about his proposal, and the old man pretends great anger. He tells Mary he will disinherit Rodney.

Rodney defies his father, and Mary is deeply touched at the lad's genuine affection for her. Mary makes a financial bargain with Martin to encourage the son to go to work.

Ambrose Peale, press agent, meets Rodney and agrees to go into business with the lad on a salary basis. Rodney has resolved to go into the soap industry and buck the trust.

Rodney, Peale and Mary go into the soap trade together. Rodney then endeavors to borrow $10,000 as capital for his newly formed company.

The offices of the "13 Soap company" are opened, and they advertise it as "the most expensive soap in the world." Peale talks advertising continually.

The 13 Soap company finds its expenses very heavy, and financial rocks loom ahead. Their chief business seems to have been to spend money for advertising under Peale's directions.

CHAPTER VII—Continued.

"You know, Miss Grayson, you're making me believe we'll win that $30,000 from old John Clark."

"Oh, indeed we shall! You should have just seen Rodney borrow $10,000 from Mr. Smith without the least trouble."

"Oh, that was my money," said Martin, smiling. "When Smith told me

"When you fail don't come sniveling back here."

Rodney tried to touch him—well, I thought the least I could do was to back my own son, so I sent Smith out to make good with him."

"That was nice of you," said Mary, outwardly polite, but inwardly disappointed at the deception.

"Well, I owed the boy a chance anyhow," said Martin, softening a little, then suddenly talking very sternly again as he caught sight of Rodney through the open door.

"So you're still hanging around, are you?" he grumbled, facing his only son relentlessly.

"Yes, sir, but I came to see Miss Grayson," said Rodney, coming in to his father perkily. "Come, Mary," he added to the new secretary.

"Really going into business, eh?" scoffed his father. "Well, when you fail don't come sniveling back here. You can't count on a dollar from me. You're leaving my employ, of course, Miss Grayson?"

"I won't snivel—and I don't want your money," retorted Rodney. "I don't need it. Why, if I'd known how easy it is to raise $10,000 I'd have gone to work long ago."

Mr. Martin, Sr., grinned at Mary.

"You would, eh? Well, what soft, easy going business have you picked out?" he inquired sarcastically.

"The soap business," said Rodney.

Mr. Martin, Sr., was genuinely annoyed.

"What! Why, you can't make any money out of soap."

"Oh, yes; I can."

"I control all the important soap business in the country."

"I know you do, but I am going to take it away from you."

"What?" roared Mr. Martin.

"Yes, sir, I'm going to manufacture the 13 Soap," began Rodney, spouting his piece, "unlucky for dirt—the most expensive soap in the world. I'm going to break the trust. I'm going to attack monopoly. I'm going to appeal to the American people for fair play against the soap trust. You've always wanted me to go into business. Well, I'm in, and forgive me, father, but I'm going to put you out of business. I'm going to advertise all over the world."

"You can't fight the soap trust with advertising; we're established," said his father coldly.

"Yes, yes, we can," said Rodney. "Think what advertising means—the power of suggestion, the psychology of print. Why, 97 per cent of the public believes what it's told, and what it's told is what the other chap's been told, and the fellow who told him read it somewhere. Advertising is responsible for everything."

Ambrose Peale came in during this tirade and stood listening, surprised and pleased with his pupil's aptitude.

"People are sheep and advertising is the way to make 'em follow your lead," went on Rodney, trying not to forget the speech. "Say, what makes you go to the theater? I'll tell you. It's what you've read of the play or what some fellow's told you, and the fellow that told him read it in a newspaper. And that, father, is the whole secret of it. You've got to be talked about. Get 'em praisin' or cussin', but don't let 'em be quiet. I want to tell you— Say, what kind of duck's eggs do you eat?"

"What!" cried Mr. Martin, aghast.

"Do you know anything against the duck?" shouted Rodney. "No, you don't. But when a duck lays an egg it's a fool and keeps quiet, but when a hen lays an egg—cluck, cluck, all over the place. Advertising!"

Peale joined the chorus on the old gentleman's off side, and together they talked such a blue streak that Mary put her fingers in her ears.

The offices of the soap company were located about halfway down Broadway. There was a waiting room and a private office—as private as could be expected with three people using it. It was a rather commonplace room, furnished comfortably, but not elaborately. The walls were hung with posters extolling the virtues of 13 Soap, such as—

DO YOU BELIEVE IN SIGNS?
13 Soap is Unlucky for Dirt.

BE CLEAN.
Cheap Soap is for Cheap People.

13 Soap is the Most Expensive
Soap in the World—
one dollar a cake.

One particularly large stand on one wall bore the legend:

The average cake of soap
gives you 56 washes.
A Cake of 13 Soap
gives you only 24—
BUT WHAT WASHES!

There was a door on the left of the room and also two more on the right. At the back were windows, through which the callers could see the building across the street literally covered with 13 Soap posters.

There was a desk in the middle, and there were chairs, cabinets, a hat rack, a water cooler, a safe, etc., which completed the equipment. The water cooler was much appreciated by the various errand boys, who were its chief patrons.

In a month from the time Rodney had left his father's house and embarked on his business career with Ambrose Peale there was a very fair show of activity in the 13 Soap Company's office. There was a fairly large mail—mostly circulars—which the entire office staff read through every morning, for lack of more interesting reading matter in the way of orders. Discipline was not yet rigorously enforced by anybody. Next to the circulars the largest part of the mail was invitations forwarded to Rodney from the Fifth avenue address uptown. In her capacity as secretary Mary, with her woman's curiosity, ran her steel envelope slitter through these, too, and sighed sometimes as she opened up some especially attractive bit of cardboard to think of the life that Rodney had turned his back on.

CHAPTER VIII.

Business and Love.

RODNEY'S back was turned on his old life now—there was no doubt of that. The boy was usually the first after Mary to reach the office. Peale was always late.

"I say, Peale," Rodney would say, "you're late again. It's got to stop. Here it is 10 o'clock."

"Don't scold, little boss," Peale would answer as he hung up his coat. "That blamed alarm clock—first time in my life it didn't go off."

"I'm afraid that's old stuff," Rodney would answer sternly.

One morning Peale looked at the little boss in great surprise.

"Holy Peter Piper, you've shaved off your mustache," he ejaculated.

"Yes," said Rodney, grinning, "I'm just beginning to get on to myself. By George, I certainly used to look like the deuce. Do you observe the clothes?" he added, rising and turning round.

"By George, I certainly used to look like the deuce."

"Why, you're getting to be a regular business man. My tuition," said Peale.

"You bet your life. Business is great fun," said Rodney. "I thought it would bore me, but it's immense; it's the best game I ever played. What's the news with you?"

"Well, I've been on father's trail," answered Peale. "We only just got back from Buffalo this morning."

"We?" queried Rodney.

"Yes, your father and I," Peale explained. "He went to the Intercolonial in Buffalo. I had all the billboards in the neighbeard plastered thick and forty-eight street stands along the streets to the railroad station. From the time the old man got in until he got out he couldn't look anywhere without seeing 13 Soap. I even found out the number of his room and had a small balloon floating 13 Soap streamers right outside his window. I took a page in all the Buffalo papers, bribed the hat boy to keep putting circulars in his hat every time he checked it and sent him one of our new folders every mail. I came back with him on the train, and when he went into the washroom last night I had the porter say, 'Sorry, sir, we ain't got no 13 Soap, but you can't hardly keep any on hand—it's such grand, grand soap.'"

Another day Rodney calmly said to Peale, "I have plans for our new factory."

"Plans for what? Have you gone dippy?"

"Here they are," said Rodney, producing a large blue print. "Pretty real looking, aren't they?"

"You don't mean you've actually got some nut to build us a factory?" shouted Peale.

"No, no. They are to impress father. Don't you see?"

"Oh, yes. Well, that is an idea," admitted Peale.

"If he ever does drop in to make a deal," said Rodney, "I thought we ought to have something to make a front—something that looks like a plant. And by the way, if we can let it leak out that it's the Andover soap people who are backing us with unlimited capital," went on Rodney.

"The Andover soap people?" Peale inquired.

"Sure! Father's always hated 'em in business," explained Rodney. "His oldest friend, though, is John Clark, one of the big bugs in that company. Clark's got a son, Ellery, that father dislikes because he's such a success in business—always held him up to me as a model son to pattern by. It would

Care of the Baby In Summer

Baby's Worries.

[Prepared by the children's bureau, United States department of labor.]

People are often exasperated at the fretfulness of some baby, and even mothers lose patience when a baby persistently worries, forgetting that it is only in this way that the baby can express his discomfort. Babies do not cry without cause, and when a baby cries a great deal it is a pretty good sign that something is the matter. The cause of the crying may be a very slight one in itself. A baby compelled to wear knitted wool bootees on a hot day may be utterly miserable, and another may be tormented beyond endurance by a woolen shirt or starched cap strings. Very thin, lightweight cotton garments and the fewest possible number are all the baby needs on hot days. Other sources of worry are:

Prickly Heat.—This appears as a fine red rash usually on the neck and shoulders and gradually spreads to the head, face and arms. It is caused by overheating, due either to the hot weather or to the fact that the baby is too warmly dressed. The rash comes and goes with the heat and causes intense itching. The remedy for it is to take off all the clothing and give the baby a sponge bath in tepid water in which common baking soda has been dissolved. Use a tablespoonful of soda to two quarts of water. Use no soap and do not rub the skin, but pat it dry with a soft towel. After the skin is thoroughly dry dust the inflamed surfaces with a plain talcum powder.

This ailment, like all others, is more readily prevented than cured. Frequent cool baths, very little clothing, simple food and living in cool rooms or in the open air will probably save the summer baby from much of the annoyance of prickly heat and other more serious ills.

Chafing.—Fat babies are very apt to suffer from chafing, especially in hot weather. It appears as a redness of the skin in the buttocks or in the armpits or wherever two skin surfaces persistently rub together.

Much the same treatment is required as in prickly heat. Never use soap on an inflamed skin. Instead use a soda, bran or starch bath, as advised in a former article. Directions for these baths are given in a publication called Infant Care, which may be had free of charge by addressing a request to the chief of the children's bureau, United States department of labor, Washington.

Great care should be taken not to let the baby scratch the skin when it is irritated. Sift together two parts powdered cornstarch and one part boric acid and use it freely on the chafed places. Remove wet or soiled diapers at once. Wash and dry the flesh thoroughly, then dust and powder freely between the legs.

Milk Crust.—This is a skin disease affecting the scalp, in which yellowish scaly patches appear on the baby's head. These patches should be softened by anointing them with olive oil or vaseline at night and the head washed with warm water and castile soap in the morning.

If the crust does not readily come away repeat the process until the scalp is clean. Never use a fine comb or the finger nails to remove the crusts, as the slightest irritation of the skin will cause the disease to spread further. The scales will usually disappear after a few days' careful treatment.

Constipation.—If the baby does not have at least one full bowel movement in twenty-four hours or in thirty-six at the outside he is in need of such care as will bring about this result. Breast fed babies often respond to an increased supply of laxative food in the mother's diet. If this is not sufficient a six-months-old baby may have a tablespoonful of strained orange juice between two of his morning feedings.

Perhaps the best preventive of constipation is to teach the baby to move the bowels at the same hour every day. This training should be begun when the baby is three months old and should be faithfully continued until the habit is firmly established.

Directions for carrying out this training are given in the pamphlet on infant care, already mentioned. Do not use enemas for the relief of constipation save in emergencies and do not resort to purgative medicines except with the doctor's advice.

REASON FOR BOND ISSUE

Increase In Amount of Land Damage Was Greater Than Expected.

One of the principal reasons why it is necessary to make a further issue of bonds to complete the barge canal is the increase in the amount of land damages over what was expected. A very small amount was originally estimated for land damages, and it was thought that the state would be able to sell off the abandoned lands in time to pay the remainder of the claims. So far, however, none of the abandoned lands have been sold and the state has, therefore, a very large asset, consisting of lands in Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and through the Mohawk Valley, some of which are immensely valuable.

The good work of the court of claims and of the board of claims in holding down the land damages, which the state has had to pay, is shown by the fact that up to the present time only about 15 per cent of the face of the claims have been allowed. In other words, the claims have been settled for about one-seventh of their face value. On the completion of the canal, the sale of the unused portions of the old canal will, undoubtedly, reimburse the state treasury to an amount equal, at least, to the additional $27,000,000 which is now needed, and which the voters are asked to grant this fall.

GREAT TONNAGE AWAITS COMPLETED BARGE CANAL.

Production of heavy freight in the region bordering on the Great Lakes has greatly increased since 1903. The manufacturing of goods to be shipped west from the seaboard has also increased in the Eastern cities of the country since 1903. All of the estimates which were made 12 years ago as to the possible traffic on the barge canal are now too small. The business to be done on it and the benefit to be gained will be much greater than was believed possible when it was ordered built.

Canal Enthusiasticaly Supported.

When New York state decided to build the barge canals in 1903, there was very little interest in waterway construction in the United States. That campaign aroused many enthusiastic supporters of waterways all over the country. Associations have been formed to promote an improved waterway down the Mississippi valley, between the Ohio river and the Great Lakes, and along the Atlantic seaboard, from Massachusetts to Florida. The barge type of boat, which was adopted by New York state, is the ideal of all these associations, and campaigns are now being conducted for the improvement of the various routes named. The only great waterways, however, which have been actually constructed up to the present time are the New York state barge canals, which are now 90 per cent completed.

Canada Rushing Welland Canal.

Canada is taking advantage of our delay in finishing the barge canal system by enlarging the Welland. This work was started last year and is being rapidly pressed to completion. When finished large vessels from the upper lakes can get down as far as Kingston. Traffic over the Canadian route will be greatly increased, if this work is finished before the barge canal is in operation.

WHY BARGE CANAL MUST BE COMPLETED.

The original barge canal appropriation was $101,000,000. The terminal appropriation was $19,800,000. The Cayuga and Seneca canals appropriation was $7,000,000. The total of these appropriations is $127,800,000. This money has all been spent or contracted for, and the state also is liable for land damages to about $17,000,000 more. Unless the proposed bond issued be voted upon favorably, the canals will be useless and all of this money will have been wasted.

Water Route to Lower Rail Rates.

The grain rates between Buffalo and New York have been nearly doubled in the last 15 years. In fact, they are so high at present that the great commercial organizations in Chicago, Toledo, Buffalo, Boston and New York united last year in a petition to the interstate commerce commission to reduce them. No action has yet been taken by the commission, and, in view of the previous decisions, it is doubtful whether the commission will feel that it can do it. In the meantime, immense quantities of grain are going via the Montreal route and via the gulf route, and New York state is losing its transportation business. The only way in which these rates can be reduced to a point low enough to bring back this business is by the completion of the barge canal.

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review

CREPE GEORGETTE FOR THE SERVICE BLOUSE.

Modish blouse in maize colored Crepe Georgette, brightened by a touch of old blue and gold embroidery on either side of the collar.

Women who make a special study of the wearing qualities of materials have long since learned that there is nothing more practical, and consequently cheaper in the long run than Crepe Georgette for separate blouses. Maize and the claire shades so well liked are suitable for designs of this style, the contrasting note being supplied in the bit of embroidery in the corners of the collar. Only 2¼ yards 36-inch material are required to develop the blouse in average size. No lining is required, and the neck may be finished with the high collar that is so much under discussion just now or with the turn-down effect that yields not a tittle to any rival.

If the V-shaped neck is desired the home dressmaker must remember that the neck edge is not to be cut out until after the hem is made, and then the line of cutting must follow single small "o" perforations.

Two sections of the pattern only, the back and the collar, are laid on a lengthwise fold of the material. The front is the first to be placed, however, being laid on a lengthwise thread, just a few inches from the crosswise edge of the crepe. Next comes the back, opposite which is the cuff, and to the right of the back is the collar. The piecing for the front may be laid along the selvage edge opposite the collar and just to the left of the sleeve. Finally comes the stay, laid crosswise of the material.

Provision is made for a short sleeve, but it is doubtful if the woman who is making up something for advance Autumn wear would wish anything except a long sleeve finished with a self-cuff.

High collared blouses are coming into their own again with nearing cool weather, and all of the best styles show convertible collars. The design shown here is also good for development in silk or linen.

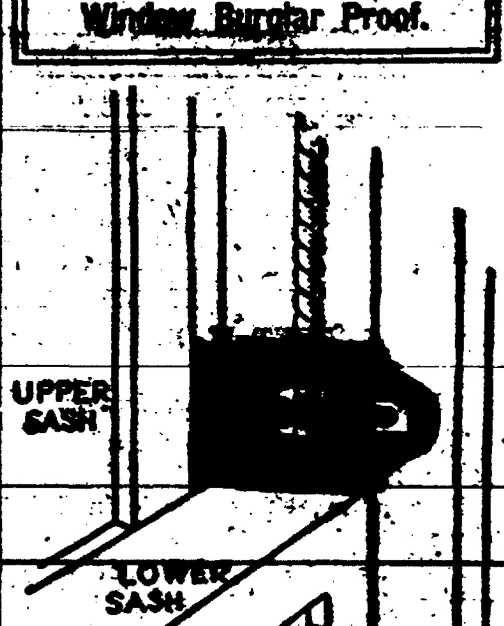
HINTS FOR THE BUSY HOUSEWIFE

Catch That Makes an Open Window Burglar Proof.



To make an open window proof against further opening by intruders is the object of a little device that has just been put upon the market. It consists of two pieces of metal sliding on each other and moved by a right and left screw. The ends of the pieces of metal are bent over at right angles, and the bent over part is covered with sharp points.

The lower sash of a window is raised a few inches, and this apparatus is put on top of it, the broad flange pressing against the inside of the window casing, the narrow flange against the upper sash and the upright bar that separates the two sashes. The screw is then turned by a key until it fits tightly, when neither upper nor lower sash can be raised or lowered. In other words, the window is locked, and if it is not wide enough open to admit a body no one can enter.

Boiled Salad Dressing.

One and one-half cupfuls of milk, two eggs, slightly beaten; four teaspoonfuls of sugar, two and one-half teaspoonfuls of mustard, two teaspoonfuls of salt, three tablespoonfuls of melted butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour, cayenne pepper and one-half cupful of vinegar.

Mix the dry ingredients and blend with them one-fourth of a cupful of the milk. Heat the rest of the milk to boiling, add the butter, thicken with the first mixture and boil for two minutes. Cautiously pour this hot liquid on the slightly beaten eggs, stirring constantly. Cook over hot water until it begins to thicken; remove, gradually stir in the vinegar and then carefully reheat until it thickens again. Cool so as to prevent curdling and pour into scalded glass vessels. This rule makes more than a pint of rather mild dressing, which will keep for a long time in a cold place.

Baked Ham and Potatoes.

Lay a thick slice of ham, one and one-quarter inch thick, in the bottom of a covered baking dish. The roaster is fine for this. Next slice enough raw potatoes for your dinner and place on top of ham, sprinkle on pepper, but no salt, and pour on enough rich milk to come almost to top of potatoes. Cover tightly and bake two hours. When finished, thoroughly the potatoes and ham will have absorbed all the milk. The ham will be freshened and delightfully tender and digestible and the potatoes seasoned just right. If ham is not fat enough a lump of butter can be used. If you have no roaster a crock with a good cover will answer nicely.

Elderberry Wine.

Over eight quarts of elderberries pour four quarts of boiling water and allow to stand for twelve hours, stirring occasionally. At the end of that time strain, pressing out the juice. To this add one tablespoonful of ground cloves, two tablespoonfuls of ground cinnamon and three pounds of sugar. These proportions are proper for four quarts of juice. Boil for five minutes and set away in a stone jar to ferment, keeping covered with a cloth. When fermentation ceases pour off carefully, bottle and seal.

Tomato Mincemeat.

For green tomato mincemeat use one peck, or fifteen pounds, of green tomatoes, chopped fine; boil fifteen minutes and drain. Then add one-half pound of suet, chopped fine; two pounds of raisins, chopped; four pounds of light brown sugar, one cupful of vinegar, two tablespoonfuls of salt, one tablespoonful of cinnamon, one tablespoonful of cloves, one tablespoonful of nutmeg, one tablespoonful of allspice. Mix these all together and cook about one-half hour, stirring often.

Burns and Scalds.

A burn is caused by dry heat and a scald by moist heat. Where there is no blister or broken skin cover the burn with thick cloths wet in a solution of strong baking soda. Keep these dressings wet continually until the pain is allayed. If blisters have already broken do not let the raw surface be exposed to dirt. Cover with clean cloths saturated with a solution of baking soda.

Copper Used in Warfare.

More than 200,000 tons of copper will have been used for military purposes in the first year of the war.

Interesting Bird Items.

Birds seen eating army worms were: Robins, catbirds, meadow larks, chewinks, thrushes and wrens.

In Germany the owners of vineyards are encouraged by their government to distribute nesting material and erect birdhouses in their vineyards to attract feathered foes of insect pests.

The swiftest bird is said to be the frigate bird. This bird is able to fly, under favorable conditions, 200 miles an hour.

Her Type.

Bella—No, you might call her a garage wife.—New York Sun.

THE SECRETARY BIRD.

It Kicks Like a Mule and Can Swallow a Snake Whole.

The rarest and most valuable birds in the New York zoological garden are the strange pair of secretary birds quartered in the ostrich house. "Secretary birds" they are called because of the crest of long dark plumes that rises from the back of their heads, giving them the appearance of a clerk with a bunch of quill feathers behind his ear. It's an aristocratic name, but the thing that makes the secretary bird valuable is not his looks. The natives of South Africa love him because he can kick like a mule.

Toss into his cage a snake, no matter how vicious, and the fight begins immediately. The bird cautiously approaches the snake with wings widespread to escape the sudden lunges by flight if necessary. Once, twice, three times perhaps the snake lunges. The bird darts back, waiting his chance. At last it comes, and one of these long, hard legs shoots out like the hoof of a mule, landing squarely on the snake's head. It reels and falls back stunned to be knocked out completely by a second blow. And then its victor proceeds to swallow it whole.

In South Africa the birds are regarded as a great protection. They are affectionate mates and always travel together. When pursued they spread their wings and make off over the ground with the speed of a running horse.—Every Week.

VOTES AND DIVORCES.

From 1902 to 1906 the increase in divorces in Colorado was less than one-half of what it was in a number of man suffrage states.

In Colorado the increase was 49.2 per cent. In California divorces decreased 12.8 per cent in that time.

Note this—divorces meantime increased in Indian Territory and Oklahoma 91 and 73 per cent, in Florida 83.5 per cent, in Mississippi 54.6 per cent, in North Dakota 56.6 per cent and in Louisiana 60.7 per cent. From 1887 to 1891 divorces increased 115.2 per cent in Nebraska and 107.8 in Louisiana. In South Dakota between 1882 and 1886 they increased 287.4 per cent, decreasing in the same period in Utah and Nevada.

Probably you know that Colorado, California, Utah and Nevada, where the showing is best for permanency of the marriage bond, are suffrage states.

GREATER CHICAGO.

How She Wrests New York at the Polls.

There are more voters in the city of Chicago than in the city of New York.

There were in New York in the presidential election of 1912, 627,864 voters; in the gubernatorial election of 1914, 481,444 voters.

There registered in Chicago in the mayoralty election, April 6, 1915, 486,815 men and 282,291 women, a total of 769,106.

Eighty-seven per cent of those registered voted: 88 per cent of the men and 86 per cent of the women.

The vote in Chicago April 6, 1915, was 426,094 men, 243,797 women; total, 669,891.

By adding her women Chicago increases the strength of her electorate, even in a mayoralty election, by 40,000 more votes than New York can muster for a presidential election.

Mint Relishes.

Green Peas and Mint.—Shell green peas just before they are to be cooked. Line the top of a double boiler with green lettuce leaves, put the peas in, add a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, cover and cook until done, which will be about half an hour or perhaps forty minutes. Then drain, add a tablespoonful of finely minced mint, salt and pepper and two tablespoonfuls of butter.

Mint Sauce.—In taking your walks abroad at this season bring home with you if you can a handful of mint from the brookside. To make the sauce that goes so excellently well with spring lamb or game chop fine the well washed leaves of a bunch of mint, then pour over them a cupful of boiling water and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar. Cover and let stand in a cool place for an hour to fuse; then add a quarter of a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of paprika and four tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Mix thoroughly and serve with the meat.

Mint Chutney—Add to a handful of finely minced mint leaves a cupful of seeded raisins, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one of tomato ketchup and a saltspoonful of salt. Mash and mix until juicy; then serve in a boat with cold meats.

Mint Sherbet.—Take six lemons, two oranges, two cupfuls of sugar, two cupfuls of water, one large bunch of fresh mint, the white of one egg and a piece of green leaf the size of a pea. Squeeze the juice from the lemons and oranges. Pour cold water over the peelings and put on the stove, allowing it to come to a boil; then pour it over the sugar and mint, which has been cut up fine. Cover it and allow it to steep for an hour. Then strain over the juice of the lemons and oranges. Dissolve the green leaf in a little of the mixture until it is clear and then add to the juices. Mix the ingredients together with the white of an egg, well beaten, and put in the freezer. Serve in sherbet glasses garnished with a tiny sprig of mint.

LIVER HASH.

LUNCHEON MENU.
Liver Hash.
Watercress. Graham Bread Toast.
Baked Rhubarb With Strawberries. Tea.

LIVER Hash.—One pint of liver, chopped coarse and measured after chopping. In frying pan melt one tablespoonful of butter, add one teaspoonful of flour and blend well. Now add one cupful of water gradually, while stirring, and season with salt and pepper. Stir in the liver and simmer for twenty minutes. Just before serving add one teaspoonful of lemon juice.

Creamed Cabbage.—Chop fine one small cabbage, cook one hour, or until it begins to turn dark, seasoning with salt, pepper and plenty of butter. Before removing from fire sprinkle with one scant tablespoonful flour; add cream to make a smooth sauce.

Grapefruit In Glasses.—If one possesses the glasses made especially for grapefruit, the pulp of the fruit is removed in spoonfuls and put into the small inside cups, the cracked ice filling the space between them and the other edge of the glass. A little sugar is added to the fruit if desired, and the whole is "topped off" by two maraschino cherries. If one hasn't the glasses, the fruit should be chilled and put in spoonfuls into the empty shells. Serve the grapefruit shells on small plates, with either orange or grapefruit spoons.

Egg Toast a la Armenia.—Six or eight slices bread, dry and toasted. Milk, a cupful. Eggs, three or four. Butter, in quantity required for frying. Sugar to taste. Dampen the dry bread with milk and after dipping into the beaten egg fry in smoking hot butter on both sides. Some prefer only eggs and omit milk; others use milk with eggs beaten in, but the results are similar. Serve with sugar or sirup if desired.

Fairy Cream Cake.—Two cupfuls sugar, two-thirds cupful butter, one cupful milk, two and three-fourths cupfuls flour, one-fourth cupful cornstarch, three even teaspoonfuls baking powder, whites of seven eggs, vanilla to taste. Cream butter, add sugar; beating well, then eggs, flour with cornstarch and baking powder. This makes two cakes.

Orange Drops.—Grate rind of one orange and squeeze out juice, taking care to reject seeds; add to this a pinch of tartaric acid; then stir in confectioners' sugar until it is stiff enough to form into balls the size of a small marble. This is delicious candy. The same process for lemon drops, using lemons in place of oranges.

DIVISION ENGINEER SHIFTED TO BUFFALO; ACHESON REPLACES HIM

Syracuse, Sept. 18.—Through a shake-up in the Syracuse and Buffalo offices of the State Highway Department, Charles J. McDonough, who for the past two years has been division engineer in District No. 6, which includes Oswego County, will be transferred to Buffalo. Division Engineer William M. Acheson in charge of the Buffalo office will go to Syracuse.

The changes in the division engineers were announced yesterday in Albany by State Commissioner of Highways Edwin Duffey, following closely a recent conference which he held with the Syracuse Automobile Club at the Onondaga Hotel. In announcing the transfers he stated that they were being made to increase the general efficiency of the department.

The conference between Commissioner Duffey and the Syracuse Automobile Club officials and members came about through numerous complaints made by the club that Syracuse and Onondaga County were not getting their share of good roads. The Automobile Club had the support of the Syracuse Chamber of Commerce which was represented by officials at the conference. Commissioner Duffey promised to see to it that more progress was made in the construction of those roads.

Whether the conference at Syracuse has had anything to do with the removal of Division Engineer McDonough or not is not stated, but good roads men believe that, with other things that have occurred in this district over which Engineer McDonough had charge, has had a strong bearing on the double transfer.

PLAN AGAINST WHITE PLAGUE

Plans for a national Medical Ex- Crusade Day, ananaoraradaionanonan amination Day, and a Children Health Crusade Day, and a Tuberculosis Week, December 6 to 12, were announced today by The National Association for the study and prevention of Tuberculosis.

Medical Examination Day is set for Wednesday, December 8, and will be the first effort on a national scale to urge an annual physical examination for everyone. Plans for the day include an appeal to induce everyone, sick or well, to see a doctor and learn whether they are in good physical condition. The schemeincludes also the inauguration on the part of factories, stores and offices of an annual physical examination for all employes. Thousands of anti-t-uberculosis associations, other societies and dispensaries all over the country are expected to co-operate in furnishing free examinations for those not able to pay a physician.

Children's Health Crusade Day on Fridya, December 10, is planned to interest and instruct school children in healthful living. Special exercises will be held at which lectures, essays, and plalets will be given on the subject of health. This will also be the occasion for launching the Red Cross Christmas Seal in the schools.

The culmination of the campaign will be the sixth annual celebration of Tuberculosis Sunday. Last year on Tuberculosis Day over 100,000 of the churches gave attention to the subject of tuberculosis by sermons, talks and annoucements. The Governors of all the states will be asked to issue proclamations calling attention to the importance of increasing the knowledge of thep ublic on how to avoid consumption. Clubs, lodges and societies will also be asked to consider the subject at a meeting either on Tuberculosis Sunday or some other day of Tuberculosis Week.

AN AUTUMN OFFERING SENT BY MRS. COLE

Mrs. Edward Cole of the East River Road contributed graciously this morning to The Times office with one of Nature's rare autumn offerings.

In the box which came through Uncle Sam's agency was a collection of dahlias, phlox, black raspberry branches bearing the full fruit, half ripened fruit and also the blossoms. And mingling with all was a portion of a strawberry plant with blossoms and a full-sized berry nearly ripened. This, Mrs. Cole informed the carrier, was the result of a second bearing of early season berries.

Closed-mindedness is the besetting sin and the insignia of the little man, just as open-mindedness is the universal distinguishing quality of the big man.—Lewis.

While we do not advertise to give goods away, we will sell you first-class groceries on as small a margin of profits as is consistent with safe business. You know that some goods are so cheap in quality that they are dear in price. We deliver goods and take orders when requested and we give valuable presents with tea and coffee; also movie coupons with each cash purchase.

LOYALTY TO OUR COMMUNITY

AM I A LOYAL CITIZEN? DO I PERFORM A FAIR SHARE OF MY DUTIES TOWARD THE COMMUNITY IN WHICH I LIVE?

Let us discuss the subject, fairly and openly.

In the first place, we each owe something to our community. We each derive benefits and profits because of our association with the community of which we are each a part, making us each responsible for a fair proportion of the cost of maintaining the support of the community.

The physical responsibility is represented by the taxes we pay. Too many of us are satisfied with the perfunctory performance of that part—leaving the moral responsibility to others.

In other words, WE ARE TOO EASILY INCLINED TO BELIEVE THAT THE PAYMENT OF OUR TAXES RELIEVES US FROM ANY AND ALL RESPONSIBILITIES IN CONNECTION WITH THE COMMUNITY IN WHICH WE LIVE.

We are inclined to forget that the many comforts and conveniences, both in a social and a business way, which we find in our community, are ours because of our association with our kind; with others who have invested their dollars and their efforts here, just as we have ourselves.

We expect our associates to be loyal to us and to our community and we, at least pretend, that we are loyal to them.

Are we loyal?

If we purchase our necessities and luxuries from mail order houses, we are not loyal to our associates in the community, because we then show no appreciation of their endeavors to supply the members of the community with these things. We are not helping our associates to maintain their establishments, which can be successfully operated only with our co-operation and support.

If we send our dollars out of town—to the mail order houses—we can only expect that the time will quickly come when we must send to the mail order houses for everything we require, because it is only natural that our local business houses will become discouraged if we do not patronize them and buy our merchandise from them, and go out of business.

Even now we note that the stocks of some local stores have been restricted to such things as must be bought to comply with emergencies, for the reason that our citizens send to the big cities, to the mail order houses, for so many of the goods which should be found on the shelves of our local stores. And it will be but natural for our business men to continue to restrict their stocks to the merchandise which our citizens do not find it convenient to buy from the mail order houses until we will awaken some day to a realization of the fact that we must send away for practically everything.

Then what will happen? We will discover that the mail order houses, finding little, if any competition for our business in our home community, will be the ones to profit, because we must then send to them for all we require in the way of merchandise.

It is not impossible, although it is admittedly improbable, that when the mail order houses shall have driven competition from the field by eliminating our local merchants, with our aid, foolishly tendered through our sending orders away from home, that there will be a readjustment of prices so that we must pay more for the things we buy. At any rate, we should be compelled to pay whatever prices the mail order houses might choose to charge us, with no competition against them to protect us.

At any rate, we are really trying to cut our own throats when we send our money away from home. Loyalty means more than a mere perfunctory appreciation of the efforts of our local merchants to supply our necessities, for it means that we are conserving our own interests and protecting ourselves against the exactions of monopoly. We are fighting for our own protection against the conditions which are bound to come unless we help our local storekeepers to maintain their business relations with us and to stand between us and the big mail order concerns which are lying in wait to take their business away and compel us to send to the big cities for everything we require in merchandise.

When we pay our dollars to our associates in the community, the storekeepers, let us do it cheerfully and with a feeling that we are providing for our future welfare. Let us forget the attractive and often misleading descriptions in the catalogues of the mail order houses and remember the kindly, friendly spirit of our local dealers who strive earnestly to merit our trade and who, when everything has been carefully analysed, give us much better service and more satisfaction in the end than we can expect from the mail order house where every customer is known merely as a number and every shipment a mere mechanical transaction made at the convenience of an underpaid employe.

LOYALTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

METROPOLITAN MOUNTED OFFICERS WERE DINED

Tom Leonard and Sergeant Burns, New York mounted police, who are among the picked squadron at the State Fair this week, were visitors in this city last night as the guests of "Blackie" Gordon of the Fulton police. Mrs. Leonard has been visiting her sister, Mrs. Tom Gordon of Hannibal st. for the past week.

The New York police inspected the local headquarters and announced themselves pleased with the city and with the local police force. They were guests of Chief Edward Dyer and Officer Gordon at dinner at the Hotel Clark last night.

PREACHERS TO PLEAD FOR PERMANENT FUND

There will be a mass meeting in the interest of the Preachers' Permanent Funds at the Fir t Methodist church Monday morning. Two noted evangelists will preach, Dr. Joseph Hindsley of Chicago and Dr. Samuel Greenfield of Utica. The men of the State Street and First Methodist churches will enjoy supper together at the First church before the service. The supper will be served at seven o'clock by the ladies of both churches.

THE QUIRK.

The offering for today is the first two reels of "Neal of the Navy," reported to be the best serial photoplay story yet produced, and four other reels of equal quality. For Sunday the feature picture of a big ten-r-eel show is "The Arrival of Perpetut," in five complete parts. Charlie Chaplin in a two-reel Essanay comedy entitled "Work," and three other reels are the balance of this splendid program.

CALDER'S CANDIDACY GAINING STRENGTH DAILY

Syracuse, Sept. 18.—William M. Calder, of Brooklyn, who almost won the Republican nomination for United States Senator last fall, is launching his boom for next year among the army of politicians attending the State Fair. He is meeting with considerable success.

One of the leading Republicans of the state said last night than in all probability the next contest for Senator from this state will be between Mr. Calder and Senator O'Gorman.

Men are judged by their actions, women by their looks and mules and onions by their strength.—Chicago Ledger.

People grieve too much over real and fancied errors and sorrows in the past. Wise the man who has learned to thank the Lord that they are in the past.—Wichita (Kans.) Eagle.
